Practice and Procedure—Appeal to Privy Council—Death of appellant during hearing—Abatement of appeal—Procedure for revivor—Judicial Committee Rules, 1925, r. 51.

AFTER THIS APPEAL (No. 51 of 1951) from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Ceylon, in proceedings relating mainly to a question of accounting between the parties, had been before the Board for five days, and before the argument was completed, it was announced that the appellant had died.

Sir Frank Soskice Q.C. (who with Quass Q.C., Handoo and Carl Jayasinghe had appeared for the appellant) said that the result of the appellant's death was, as he apprehended, that the appeal abated. The proper course, if the appeal was to go on, was for a petition to be filed for revivor under rule 51 of the Judicial Committee Rules, 1925. For that to be done a certificate had to be obtained from the court appealed from saying who were the proper parties to be substituted for the appellant. There was a case referred to in Bentwich's Privy Council Practice [Ledgard v. Bull [1]] in which other evidence than a certificate was accepted as to who were the proper parties. But he (counsel) was not in a position to offer any other evidence to the Board because he did not know, and had no instructions, whether a will was left, or if there was a will, who were the executors. In those circumstances it was not possible for him or for his instructing solicitors to offer any indication to the Board in the way of evidence as to who would be the proper parties.

In those circumstances he apprehended that the Board would feel that the only course that could be taken if the appeal were to go on was for a petition for revivor to be filed in the ordinary way, and it would be necessary for the petition to be accompanied by a certificate from the Supreme Court of Ceylon as to who the proper parties were. Speaking as amicus curiae, he would submit that the Board should proceed no further that day. The appeal having abated, in due course those who became the appellant's personal representatives would decide whether or not to file a petition to the Board asking that the appeal might be revived.

The course suggested by counsel was taken, the Board expressing their sympathy with the relatives of the appellant.

* BLACKMAN v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[1949 B. No. 2559.]

Negligence—Invitor and invitee—Railway station—Patch of oil—Injury to pedestrian—Standard of duty—Steps taken to render premises reasonably safe.

The plaintiff, when walking across a part of Paddington railway station premises known as the "lawn"—from which passengers were not expressly excluded—on her way to the tube station, slipped on a patch of oil which had dripped from vehicles which normally used that area, fell and sustained injuries. The foreman on duty had seen the oil when a vehicle had been moved, and he had immediately ordered sawdust, kept available for that purpose, to be put down, and had called to passengers not to go that way, but the plaintiff, who did not hear the foreman, and who was not seen by him, had slipped on the oil patch before the sawdust could be put down. The plaintiff, alleging negligence on the part of the Railway Executive, claimed damages for personal injuries:—

Held, first, that the plaintiff, although on her way to the tube station, was an invitee of the Railway Executive; and secondly, that the duty owed by the defendants was to take reasonable steps to have and to keep their premises as free from danger as they could reasonably be kept; and that there having been no failure to observe the danger or to take steps to render it innocuous in reasonable time, it could not be said that in the circumstances of the case the plaintiff's accident was due to any failure by the Railway Executive to exercise reasonable care, and they were not therefore liable.

ACTION.

BLACKMAN v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

On May 19, 1948, the plaintiff was walking across Paddington station on her way to the Bakerloo Tube railway station. Part of the great hall of Paddington station, known as the lawn, was shut off on the north side by a train arrival indicator and movable barriers and on the south by buildings, and the whole of that space, except immediately in front of the bookstall and cloakroom, was used for the loading and unloading of mail-bags and mail vans, barrows and trolleys, used for the carriage of mail-bags, stood there. Normally the whole space was busily occupied, and when the mail vans, barrows and trolleys were all there it was a working part of the station and passengers were obstructed from going there. So that the mail vans and trolleys could go in and out it was impossible for the space to be shut off on the east and west sides by barriers which would prevent passengers from going into it. There was no particular marking or indication to show passengers that they were not to go on that part of the station. The barrows standing there had iron wheels and axles from which oil from time to time dripped on to the ground; when that occurred sawdust, kept on the premises for that purpose, was put upon the oil.

On the day in question the plaintiff entered the station by the mail vans entrance and crossed the lawn in order to take what for her would be the quickest way. Just before she arrived at the lawn some barrows, underneath which a large thick patch of oil had formed, were moved, and the foreman on duty noticed the oil on the ground. He immediately shouted to passengers not to go that way, and tried to make them go round by the bookstall, and he called to a trolley driver to bring some sawdust and put it down. At that time the plaintiff was passing behind the foreman; he did not see her and she did not hear him directing the passengers not to go that way. She walked across the lawn behind him, slipped on the patch of oil and fell, injuring her back and shoulder.

She brought this action for damages in respect of her injuries, alleging negligence against the Railway Executive in that they, their servants or agents, caused or permitted the platform to become dangerous to pedestrians by leaving on it oil or other material of a slippery nature on which she, whilst lawfully walking across the station, did in fact slip. The defendants denied that the plaintiff was walking lawfully at the material time and place, and they denied negligence.

Council [2]; Bloomstein v. Railway Executive [3]; Tomlinson v. Railway Executive. [4]

HILBERY J., having stated the facts, considered the medical evidence, and assessed the plaintiff's damages, if recoverable, at £500, continued: In the first place, I have to ascertain whether the plaintiff could be said to be an invitee or merely a licensee on the Paddington station premises; she came on the station in order to become a passenger in the tube, but Paddington premises are those of the Western Section and not of the Tube Railways, which are managed by the London Transport Executive. That question was examined in Bloomstein v. Railway Executive,[5] where the plaintiff had travelled from Camden Town to Euston on the underground railway but was nevertheless held to be an invitee of the Railway Executive on Euston station. Parker J. said: "If one looks at the Transport Act, 1947, it is clear that "all the properties, Euston, the L.M.S., the London Public "Transport Board, the underground and so on, were vested in the "Transport Commission, but for convenience the Transport "Commission's powers, liabilities and duties are delegated to "the various Executives including the Railway Executive and the "London Transport Executive. Section 5 (4) of the Act provides: "'Each Executive shall, as agents for the Commission, exercise "'such functions of the Commission as are for the time being "'delegated to them by or under a scheme made by the Commis-"'sion and approved by the Minister.' And then by subsection "(9) it is provided: 'As respects matters for the time being "'falling within the scope of any such delegation, the following "'provisions shall have effect except as between the Executive "'and Commission, that is to say—(a) any rights, powers and "'liabilities of the Commission shall be treated as rights, powers "'and liabilities of the Executive, and the Executive only.'" He went on to say: "It seems to me that the duty of invitor "to invitee is owed by the Transport Commission in respect of "its properties, and that for convenience those duties are to be "treated as the duties of the Executive in question. Accordingly, "under that Act any duty that the Commission owed to Mrs. "Bloomstein as a passenger on one part of the site is to be "treated as a duty of the Executive in question, the Railway "Executive." He therefore came to the conclusion in that case that the plaintiff, although she was on Euston station at the time and was intending to be a passenger in the Tube railway, was an invitee of the Railway Executive.

I therefore treat the plaintiff in the present case as an invitee of the Railway Executive—but an invitee of the Railway Executive where? There is nothing at Paddington station to show passengers that they are not entitled to cross that part of the property which is called the lawn, but the very presence of a large number of standing barrows and mail vans is a sufficient indication in the ordinary way that passengers are not invited to go that way; indeed they cannot do so when it is obstructed by the barrows unless they choose to thread a way between them. Anybody entering Paddington station by the mail van's entry would know that the way in which a passenger is intended, and invited, to go, is to turn to the left close to the bookstall, or to the right close along the front of the cloakroom, but there is no particular marking to show the bounds within which a passenger is intended to move, or to denote to a passenger that the lawn is a place that he must not go upon. Indeed, passengers cross the lawn if they are taking a short cut across from that entry to such platforms as 5, 6, 7, 8 or 9. In the circumstances, therefore, I treat the plaintiff as an invitee on this part of the station.

What, therefore, is the measure of the duty that is owed? I have been referred to Tomlinson v. Railway Executive [6] in the Court of Appeal before Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson L.JJ., which bears many resemblances to the present case. There the plaintiff had arrived by train at Euston station at a time of day when the porter on duty at the platform had to light lamps; there was only one porter and that was sufficient in the ordinary way, but there had just been a fall of snow on the platform, making it slippery, and the porter was unable both to clear the snow and to light the platform. An ill-lighted platform is a danger to passengers, and the porter first discharged the duty of lighting the lamps, and left the clearing of the snow till after he had lighted the platform. The plaintiff, getting out of the train, slipped on the snow and fell. The Court of Appeal treated the case as one where there was a duty to take reasonable care to have the premises reasonably safe for passengers. Somervell L.J. said: "I think it is worth pointing out that we are "concerned in this case with a particular sort of danger, the "danger from snow. There is no question, as there has been "in some cases, of an independent contractor employed by the "defendant. There is no question whether the duty is the duty "to take reasonable care to make safe or whether the duty is to "have premises as safe as reasonable care can make them. None "of those questions arises because it is common ground that if "there was a failure here it was a failure by the defendants "or their servants to take reasonable care with regard to this "snow. The judge found that the defendants had foreseen "the possibility of snow getting on to this platform and becoming "slippery and there were available buckets of sand and salt and "standing instructions as to sanding and salting. The duty of "sanding and salting at this station was on the porter and there " was only one porter. When this snow came down he, quite " rightly, considered sanding and salting, but at this particular " time of day he had another duty to perform, and that was to " see that certain emergency lamps were lighted so that they " would be available in the event of a power cut. There had " been a number of power cuts at this time and, of course, the " whole station would be plunged into complete darkness unless " there were emergency lamps available. So that was another " problem with which the defendants had to deal, and they had " dealt with it by having lamps and by giving standing instruc- " tions that shortly before dusk those lamps were to be lighted, " and it was most important that they should be lit. The porter " who had begun to sand the snow, though he had not got to the " place where the plaintiff unfortunately fell, went off to light " the lamps. It was because he had that duty cast upon him " at that time that he did not and could not proceed with the " salting and sanding of the snow."

BLACKMAN v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

Hilbery J.

In those circumstances Parker J. found that the Railway Executive had failed to take reasonable care; the Railway Executive appealed and the Court of Appeal allowed their appeal. Somervell L.J. said: " It was, of course, a very short time after " this snowstorm that the accident happened. It seems to me " it would be an impossible burden on people in the position of " the Railway Executive qua snowstorms to say that the snow " must be salted or sanded as soon as it falls. If that was an " absolute duty it is difficult to see how reasonable care could " provide for it. It was a very short time after the snow fell " that the accident happened. It was, of course, an unfortunate " coincidence for the plaintiff that the duty of lighting these " lamps happened to coincide with this short, sharp snowstorm, " but it is still a fact that no one can expect snow to be sanded " or salted instantaneously. The danger of snow being slippery " everyone appreciates, although that does not mean that those " in the position of the defendants must not take reasonable " steps to prevent its remaining in that condition."

In the present case the foreman on duty on this part of the station noticed a patch of oil—thick oil—which had hitherto been under the barrows and was disclosed when they were moved; that is not unlike a snowfall. As soon as he observed it he tried to stop people coming round that way, and he shouted out to a man to get sawdust and put it down. Just as in Tomlinson v. Railway Executive [7] sand was kept available in the case of snow, so sand and sawdust are kept available at Paddington to meet cases where something makes the surface of the platforms or the ground slippery—the ground on which passengers, or intending passengers, may walk.

In Stowell v. Railway Executive [8] one of the platforms used during the night for fish traffic was found to be slippery and to have been left slippery so that a person coming to meet passengers slipped and fell and injured himself. In the present case, as soon as the trolleys were moved the foreman saw that oil had dripped on to the surface, and immediately took steps—the appropriate steps—to render that oil patch innocuous so far as any slipperiness was concerned. He sent a man to fetch sawdust, and he himself tried to divert passengers; he did not see the plaintiff go behind him and he was calling out to passengers to go close to the front of the bookstall when he heard a commotion behind him and, looking round, he saw that the plaintiff had fallen.

[7] The Times, Nov. 5, 1952.

[8] [1949] 2 K.B. 519.

I have to ask myself whether, in the circumstances, there was any failure to exercise reasonable care either to keep, or to have that part of the station reasonably safe for the passage of passengers. Just as the fall of snow in Tomlinson v. Railway Executive [9] left in the circumstances little time for the porter to complete sanding and do his other jobs, so here this oil patch was not apparent as anything that might possibly affect passengers until the barrows were moved. The very purpose for which this part of the station is used prevents it from being permanently fenced off against use by passengers.

Everyone knows, and the Railway Executive through its servants must know, that wherever motor vehicles and well-oiled axles and wheels stand for any length of time oil is liable to drip and form a patch that may be slippery. But on this particular occasion there was no failure to observe within a reasonable time that an oil patch had formed. It was observed at once by the foreman, who immediately took steps to eliminate the possible danger from the slipperiness of the oil. There was no failure, therefore, in the way of taking steps in time to endeavour to render the situation free from danger. Can it be fairly said that the steps which were taken were not reasonably sufficient steps? The Railway Executive, as occupiers of these premises, are not insurers; they do not guarantee a person coming on the premises against any accident, or against slipping or falling. All that they do is to take reasonable steps to keep the premises as free from danger as they can reasonably be kept. Whether reasonable steps have been taken in cases such as this is always a matter of degree. As the cases that I have cited show, lawyers in different courts may take different views whether in the circumstances reasonable care has been exercised by defendants or whether a plaintiff's accident ought justly to be said to be due to a failure to take that reasonable care; but since the standard is that of reasonable care, I am bound to say in this case that the plaintiff has failed to show that her accident was due to a failure on the part of the Railway Executive's employees in the particular circumstances to exercise reasonable care.

There will, therefore, be judgment for the defendants.

* BECKETT v. NEWALLS INSULATION CO. LD. AND LIGHTFOOT REFRIGERATION CO. LD.

Negligence—Dangerous thing—"Consummate care" required—Calor gas container—Leakage—Explosion—Injury—Liability.

In two small chambers of a ship (an outer and an inner) refrigeration insulation was in course of construction. Company A on a Friday was brazing by means of gas from a calor gas container. The foreman engineer on ceasing work disconnected the cable, leaving, according to his evidence, the container, with the valve turned off and the regulator adjusted, in the outer chamber. The valve with a handle was supplied with the container, and there was no cap over it. The foreman knew that the men employed by his company would not be working in the chamber until the following Tuesday. He also knew that men employed by company B would be plastering in the two chambers on the Saturday and the Sunday. One of these men, in order that they might do their work in the outer chamber on the Sunday, at lunch time removed the container from the outer to the inner chamber. On Saturday the electric light bulbs in the chambers had been taken from their sockets. On Tuesday morning the plaintiff, an employee of B company, failing to find an electric light bulb in the outer chamber, went into the inner chamber, which was pitch dark, to seek a bulb and struck a match. There was an explosion resulting from escape of gas from the container and the plaintiff was injured. There was no evidence as to when gas first began to escape from the container. The plaintiff sued both companies:—

Held that, although the gas might be considered as a dangerous thing, the law applicable was the law of negligence, but the standard of care, in such a case, was of the highest. "The law "expects of a man a great deal more care in carrying a pound "of dynamite than a pound of butter." On these facts it was found that, by the conduct of their foreman, company A were guilty of negligence and liable in damages to the plaintiff.

Decision of Stable J., on this issue, reversed.

APPEAL from Stable J., sitting at Durham Assizes. The appeal was heard by two judges only by consent of the parties.

At Whitsuntide, 1950, the ship Gyrotoma was being fitted out at Sunderland. In two chambers of the ship refrigeration insulation was in course of construction: they were known as the meat chamber and the vegetable chamber, the latter giving access to the inner meat chamber and also to the open air. The dimensions of the meat chamber were 12 ft. by 9½ ft.; it was 6 ft. high. Each room had a door. On Friday, May 26, 1950, the second defendants, the Lightfoot Refrigeration Co. Ld., had men working in the chambers who had taken there a calor gas container. The gas was taken from the container through a cable to where it was used for brazing. When work ceased on the Friday when their apparatus had been in use, Spencer, their foreman engineer, took the cable off the container and left the container with other tackle in a corner of the outer chamber. On Saturday and Sunday, May 27 and 28, two men, Edmunds and Beckett, the plaintiff, employed by Newalls Insulation Co. Ld., the first defendants, were working on plastering the two rooms, including work on the floors. Having finished their work in the inner chamber they started on the outer chamber, but found the tackle left in the corner by the foreman of the refrigeration company. Edmunds, the senior of the two men plastering, moved the container from the outer into the inner chamber on Sunday, May 28, at lunch time. No work was done in the chambers on the Monday. On the Saturday the bulbs of the electric lights had been taken out and electricity disconnected. On the Sunday the two men used candles. Men from the refrigeration company had not worked in the two chambers on the Saturday, Sunday or Monday.

On Tuesday morning, May 30, Beckett, the plaintiff, a man 20 years of age, having opened the door, went into the outer chamber and looked for an electric light bulb. Not seeing one, he went into the inner chamber, which was pitch dark. He struck a match to help him to find a bulb when there was an explosion of a mixture of gas and air which blew him into the outer chamber and he was burned and seriously injured.

Gas from the container cylinder came through a valve which, if securely turned, would prevent its escape. Beyond that and between that and where the cable was, when affixed, was a regulator, and if the regulator were properly adjusted there could be no escape of gas, even if the valve had been left open. When the container was delivered to a purchaser the valve was covered by a cap, which could be screwed tightly on and over the valve. There was a handle on the top of the cap, so that the container could be carried by it. If that were done the regulator would be disconnected. The container would be in a safer condition if the cap were on over the valve, since the valve could not then be turned or moved without the removal of the cap. A witness testified that when the container was taken on to the ship there was no cap on it. And it was clear that there was no cap on the container when it was left in the outer chamber by Spencer, the foreman of the refrigeration company.

The plaintiff brought his action against the two defendants, in each case alleging negligence. As regards the insulation company he alleged negligence against their servant Edmunds when removing the calor gas container from the outer to the inner chamber on the Sunday. He alleged that the refrigeration company were negligent and he gave as particulars: "They left "the cylinder in the refrigerator in a faulty and defective and "dangerous condition, so that gas would or might escape from it. "They left it where it might have to be handled by others with "the valve exposed and without a proper protective cap or other "locking device fitted on it so that anyone handling the cylinder "would be likely to take hold of the valve itself and turn it, "with the result that gas would be permitted to escape. They "failed to give any adequate warning of the danger of taking "hold of the valve to other persons who might have occasion to "approach or handle the cylinder."

C. A. 1952

BECKETT v. NEWALLS INSULATION CO. LD. AND LIGHTFOOT REFRIGERATION CO. LD.

The insulation company by their defence denied negligence. They pleaded that "the said accident was caused or contributed "to by the negligence of the" refrigeration company, as alleged in paragraph 4 of the statement of claim. The refrigeration company by their defence denied negligence and alleged that: "The "accident to the plaintiff, if any, was wholly or directly or partly "caused by the negligence of the plaintiff himself and of the said "Edmunds and of some other servant of the first defendants or "of one or more of them in handling a cylinder of calor gas and "moving and using it in such manner as to open the valve of "the cylinder and to permit the escape of gas from it and in "leaving the said cylinder or causing or permitting it to be left "in a confined space in the said ship without closing or ensuring "that the valve thereof was securely and tightly closed and "in leaving or permitting the cylinder to be left with the gas "escaping from it and (in the case of the plaintiff) in striking a "match in a chamber where he knew a cylinder of calor gas had "been so left without first ascertaining whether it was safe to "expose a naked light."

Stable J. found no negligence on the part of either of the defendants, for whom he gave judgment, but he provisionally assessed the damages at £615. The plaintiff appealed.

SINGLETON L.J. The case for the plaintiff, as put forward in this court, was that the refrigeration company were dealing with something of a dangerous character, to wit gas, and that they did not use sufficient care in the way they left the container. Mr. Veale, on behalf of the plaintiff, referred us to some words of Lord Wright in Northwestern Utilities Ld. v. London Guarantee and Accident Co. Ld.[13] where, after considering dangerous things in general, he said[14]: "That gas is a dangerous thing within the "rules applicable to things dangerous in themselves is beyond "question. Thus the appellants who are carrying in their mains "the inflammable and explosive gas are prima facie within "the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher,[15] affirming Fletcher v. "Rylands[16]; that is to say, that though they are doing nothing "wrongful in carrying the dangerous thing so long as they keep "it in their pipes, they come prima facie within the rule of strict "liability if the gas escapes: the gas constitutes an extraordinary "danger created by the appellants for their own purposes, and "the rule established by Rylands v. Fletcher[15] requires that they "act at their peril and must pay for damage caused by the gas "if it escapes, even without any negligence on their part. The "rule is not limited to cases where the defendant has been "carrying or accumulating the dangerous thing on his own land: "it applies equally in a case like the present where the appellants "were carrying the gas in mains laid in the property of the City "(that is in the sub-soil) in exercise of a franchise to do so"; and Lord Wright repeated the words of Lord Dunedin in Dominion Natural Gas Co. Ld. v. Collins and Perkins,[17] and said[18]: "'Have the defendants been able to show affirmatively "'that the true cause of the accident was the conscious act of "'another volition, i.e., the tampering with the machines by the "'railway company's workmen?' It is not here intended to "enumerate all the defences which might be available to a defen-"dant in this class of action: but the two defences mentioned "are both material in this case."

damaged by the explosion. It is difficult, indeed, to see that there could be any escape of gas from the container if the valve was turned tightly down and if the regulator was properly adjusted. It is equally difficult to see that, if both those things were done, there could be an accidental turning on of both, or an inadvertent turning on of both.

Stable J., in the course of his judgment, said: "Mr. Edmunds "admits that he picked the cylinder up, that he moved it from "one compartment to the other, and that he put it down. He "said that he handled the thing carefully, because he knew that "it contained gas, and in the course of his experience he had "known of explosions of acetylene or other gases. He says "perfectly frankly that, having put it down, he did not test the "taps to make certain that inadvertently he had not given a "twist which allowed some gas to escape."

The learned judge later said: "Mr. Veale puts his claim "against the refrigerating company in this way. He says that "this calor gas cylinder is placed by the law in a peculiar category "of things called dangerous. It contains a gas which, although "the evidence was that it is the safest kind of gas, is susceptible "of exploding, if a mixture of the gas and the right proportion of "air comes into contact with a naked flame, and I venture "respectfully to say, with reluctance, because the doctrine of "dangerous things is one that I do not think I have ever fully "grasped, that I must accept Mr. Veale's submission that inas-"much as this thing contains gas it comes within this rather "mysterious category of things known to the law as dangerous "things. Therefore, inasmuch as an explosion has been caused "and injury sustained, the refrigerating company has imposed "upon them the obligation of satisfying me that reasonable "precautions were taken, having regard to the surrounding "circumstances in relation to what was done with this cylinder "of gas."

Stable J. continued: "I am satisfied that what was done "was quite reasonable. I think that it is imposing a fantastic "standard to say that the regulator should have been dismantled "and a cap fitted over the tap." With all respect to the judge, I think that that must depend on whether or not it is easy for the tap or for the regulator, or for both, to be moved inadvertently when one is moving the container. He continued: "After all, that would not have obviated the possibility of "trouble. To have completely obviated the possibility of trouble "the thing would have had to have been locked up somewhere "where nobody could have touched it. Having regard to the "evidence of fact that these things are in universal use in private "houses, in caravans, and in motor-boats all over the country, "and that domestic gas is a feature of a vast number of dwell-"ings, with switches which let the supply of gas off and on "exposed to a mischievous act or inadvertent act, to hold that "a duty is imposed in relation to one of these cylinders in putting

" it where nobody can possibly get at it is stating the duty much " too highly. In my view, it was a perfectly reasonable thing " to leave that cylinder where it was ready for use when the men " came to work on the Tuesday, with the gas properly and " effectively turned off."

That, again, I venture to point out, must depend on the risk involved in the legitimate moving of the container itself. Stable J. continued: " The next alternative, the plaintiff having " failed against the refrigerating company, is that the wrongdoer " responsible for the mischief was Mr. Edmunds. It is, I think, " really agreed (and if it is not agreed I am perfectly satisfied " here) that Mr. Edmunds, in removing the cylinder from the " floor of this chamber where they were going to work, with all " the other things that were removed, was acting perfectly " properly, and nobody could have suggested that he was not. " It is possible that in shifting this cylinder he may—I say, he " may—have inadvertently twisted the top and perhaps the " regulator—although it is extremely difficult to see how he could " twist the regulator inadvertently—and brought about an escape " of gas."

I agree with the judge that it is extremely difficult to see how anyone moving the container (which is not a very big thing) could inadvertently turn on the tap and also move the regulator so that it was in a position to allow the escape of gas, if it was not before; for both things to have happened inadvertently seems to me to amount almost to an impossibility. The judge referred to the evidence of Mr. Barr, an engineer and an expert witness called for the refrigeration company, and said: " He thinks that " some mischievous or foolish person must have tampered with " this thing, and on purpose. However that may be, there is not " a shadow of doubt about this: nobody who saw Mr. Edmunds " for one single moment expected that he would be so foolish as " to turn this gas on on purpose. The most that can be said " against him is that he did it by mistake, inadvertently. I am " by no means satisfied that he did. This is one of those cases " in which the mystery, so far as I am concerned, remains " unsolved. The plaintiff having failed, in my judgment, to prove " any fault against anybody, inevitably as a result loses his " action, and the action must be dismissed with, presumably, the " usual consequences."

I have not referred so far to the other authorities on which Mr. Veale relied. I mention in passing that he referred to the words of Lord Macmillan in Donoghue v. Stevenson,[19] as showing that in circumstances of this kind the persons who placed the dangerous gas there were practically subject to a guarantee of safety; and he referred us to the words of Goddard L.J. in Hanson v. Wearmouth Coal Co. Ld.,[20] and of Tucker L.J. in Ball v. London County Council.[21]

BECKETT v. NEWALLS INSULATION CO. LD. AND LIGHTFOOT REFRIGERATION CO. LD.
Singleton L.J.

The judgment of Stable J. amounts to this: here is a man who went to work and who at his place of work suffered an accident of a most unusual kind, an accident which, prima facie, would not have happened without someone's negligence. The judge found that there was no negligence on the part of Edmunds, the only person who is said to have moved the container after it was placed in the outer room by the refrigerating company's foreman. He said that Edmunds might have moved the tap, and perhaps the regulator, inadvertently, thought it was extremely difficult to see how he could twist the regulator inadvertently, and he said that though he might have moved it by mistake inadvertently, he, the judge, was by no means satisfied that he had done so. He found, too, that when dealing with a container containing calor gas such as this, that which the refrigeration company's foreman, Spencer, did was quite reasonable, and that it was imposing a fantastic standard to say that the regulator should have been dismantled and the cap fitted over the top, and that it was a perfectly reasonable thing to leave that cylinder where it was ready for use, with the gas properly and effectively turned off, when the men came to work on Tuesday. I think from that it follows that the judge found that the gas was properly and effectively turned off.

If all those findings are right, it is extraordinarily difficult, if not impossible, to understand how this accident came about. There was no suggestion whatever that any other persons went on to that part of the ship at the week-end. True, it was said that the electric light bulbs were removed on the Saturday so that people would not pocket them; whether workmen or others I do not know; but there was no evidence that any unauthorized persons went on to this ship, which was in the course of construction, nor was there any suggestion whatever from the refrigeration company of any such happening. Indeed, it was pointed out to this court that the refrigeration company expressly relied on the negligence of the plaintiff himself and the other workman, Edmunds, both of whom were employed by the insulation company. There was no allegation whatever of any unauthorized interference by any party outside, so that one is faced on the findings with an accident of a kind which one would think it was quite impossible could happen if the container was in order and if the gas was properly turned off by the valve and the regulator; and in the absence of any interference with either, and if all that can be said is that the container was moved and properly moved.

It is necessary to consider the case a little closely, and in so doing I bear in mind Mr. Everett's submissions. In asking the court to uphold the judgment of Stable J. he referred us to the words of Lord Moulton in Rickards v. Lothian,[22] and to what was said in the House of Lords in Read v. J. Lyons & Co. Ld.[23] In the last case there was no allegation of negligence at all, but [22] [1913] A.C. 263, 282. [23] [1947] A.C. 156.

Mr. Everett used the report rather to draw our attention to the submissions of Sir Hartley Shawcross, then Attorney-General, who appeared for the respondents in that case.[24] I will read a few lines from the argument because they do appear to summarize the law very neatly and very accurately. The argument was put in this way: "This case is not within the rule in Rylands "v. Fletcher,[25] which is really founded on the idea that the "defendant did what he should not have done. It depends on "negligence, though the greater the danger, the greater the care "required of him. In the authorities the application of the "standard of things called dangerous in themselves has no logic "about it. The same thing has been held dangerous in itself in "some circumstances but not in others: see Salmond's Law of "Torts, 10th ed., p. 518. The true question is not whether a "thing is dangerous in itself but whether, by reason of some "extraneous circumstances it may become dangerous. There is "really no category of dangerous things; there are only some "things which require more and some which require less care."

That argument is in much the same terms as those in which Sir Percy Winfield commences chapter XXI in the fifth edition of his work on the Law of Tort, a chapter on dangerous chattels, where the author says: "There is no doubt that the law as to "liability for dangerous chattels is treated in legal literature and "practice as a separate compartment of the law of tort, but it is "not easy to explain why it is so or in what respect it is a species "of 'strict' liability. In theory the law of negligence as a tort "might be regarded as adequate to cover it. It is true that the "law expects of a man a great deal more care in carrying a pound "of dynamite than a pound of butter, or in keeping a bottle of "poison than a bottle of lemonade. But that is only another "way of saying that what is a reasonable amount of care in one "set of circumstances is not so in another set of circumstances, "and reasonable care is the sole test of negligence. And, passing "to the decided cases of dangerous chattels, we have been unable "to trace anything in the reports that is inconsistent with the "view that the law of negligence is all that is needful for the "purpose." The author then refers to Dixon v. Bell,[26] and sets out the words of Lord Dunedin in Dominion Natural Gas Co. Ld. v. Collins and Perkins.[27]

I propose to consider this case purely on the allegation of negligence which is made against the refrigeration company; I do not think that any case was proved against the insulation company. It was not alleged, or certainly it was not argued in this court, that there was any negligence on the part of the plaintiff himself. The only other employee of the insulation company who was present was Edmunds, who gave his evidence, which the judge accepted. True, Edmunds knew that the container contained gas; he had not been warned to take any particular care about it; he moved it carefully and properly, as the judge said. The judge did not think that Edmunds had moved the cap or the regulator inadvertently; he was wholly satisfied he had not done so intentionally; there was no negligence on the part of Edmunds and none on the part of his employers.

The case against the refrigeration company is different. They had introduced on to the premises a container which contained calor gas which, if it escaped, might bring about an explosion, as it did in fact. They left it on the Friday night without any cap covering the valve. The engineer-foreman, Spencer, had taken the cable off, and he had seen, according to his evidence, that the regulator was set right and that the tap was turned off. He was asked: "What did you do when you had finished? (A.) "Well, I closed the cylinder off and released this valve here and "took the cable off—the brazing torch off—and put it in the "corner of the vegetable room. (Indicating on cylinder.) (Q.) "Is that the practice you have followed over the last 10 years? "(A.) That is the practice I have always followed." He said that the effect would be to shut off any escape of gas.

The contention of the refrigeration company was that the escape of gas was due to some interference. There was no interference suggested from outside. They now seek to say that either the escape was caused by the act of Edmunds, or in some other way which is left unexplained. No question was asked at the hearing to show that anyone else was on the ship or could have got into that part of the ship where this container was left. In reply to a question it was said by counsel for the refrigeration company that possibly the insulation company might be responsible, or possibly both companies might be liable, in that it must have been the act of Edmunds that brought about this escape of gas. I cannot see that upon the evidence. Furthermore, the degree of care required from the refrigeration company, who introduced that gas container, is to be measured by the danger involved in that which they brought on to the ship. The law expects of a man a great deal more care in carrying a pound of dynamite than a pound of butter; the law expects greater care if there is introduced on to an enclosed space in a ship a container with gas inside it which may escape if precautions are not taken. One precaution which could have been taken was to put on the cap, and if that had been done no movement of the container would have interfered with the valve. Another precaution which might have been taken would have been to leave the container in a safe place. The man who had put the container in the vegetable room was asked: "You knew, did you not, that "Newalls' men were going to be about all the week-end?" and he said "Yes." He said a little later in his evidence: "I would "not expect anybody else to move the cylinder." I think he meant by that, anyone other than himself. Then he was asked: "You knew in the course of the week-end that Newalls' men " would be finishing the meat room and coming into the vegetable " room, did you not?" and he said: " I did not know whether " they would work in the meat room or the vegetable room. " (Q.) You did not think one way or the other? (A.) No."

In the result, he left the container in the vegetable room, not considering at all whether men might be working there, or whether it would be necessary to move it when the men of the insulation company worked over the week-end. It would have been reasonable, if he was going to leave a thing like that, to inquire whether anyone was going to work there; it would have been reasonable to warn people: " Do not touch this container," or: " Do not move it," if by the mere movement of it there is a chance that something in the apparatus might be moved so that there could be an escape of gas. The judge found that there was no deliberate moving of any of these things by Edmunds; at the most there was something inadvertent. If the refrigeration company's man leaves something of this kind in a position in which it is quite likely it would have to be moved, and if he does not warn anyone as to the danger of moving it, or how it should be moved, and if the thing were so constructed that when it is being moved a regulator or valve can be affected so that an escape of gas can come about, then it seems to me that the person who puts that regulator in that position is not exercising the care which he ought to exercise in regard to something of this kind.

Negligence is a failure to take that care which a reasonable man would take in the circumstances. A reasonable man who has to leave something of that kind must take more care than Spencer took. The refrigeration company said that someone must have moved the tap and/or the regulator, yet it may be that they were not both shut off as Spencer said. They said that someone moving the container could bring about an escape of gas, yet they took no care whatever to see that people who might have to move the container were warned. On the evidence there was at the most an accidental movement—although that is by no means clear—and there was an escape of gas, and that gas escaped from something introduced on the premises by the refrigeration company, who, in my judgment, did not take the care which they ought to have done in the circumstances. I feel that that being so, the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages against the refrigeration company, and I would allow this appeal and enter judgment for the plaintiff against the second defendants for the sum of £615 provisionally assessed by the judge.

MORRIS L.J. I have reached the same conclusion. In my judgment, in approaching this case it is necessary to have in mind the nature of the article with which the inquiry is concerned; the place where the article was left; the time and date when it was left, and all the other relevant circumstances. I have in mind the words used by Lord Macmillan in Read v. J. Lyons & Co. Ld.[28] He said[29]: "In an address characterized by much pain-"staking research Mr. Paull for the appellant sought to convince "your Lordships that there is a category of things and operations "dangerous in themselves and that those who harbour such things "or carry on such operations in their premises are liable apart "from negligence for any personal injuries occasioned by these "dangerous things or operations. I think that he succeeded in "showing that in the case of dangerous things and operations the "law has recognized that a special responsibility exists to take "care. But I do not think that it has ever been laid down that "there is absolute liability apart from negligence where persons "are injured in consequence of the use of such things or the "conduct of such operations. In truth it is a matter of degree. "Every activity in which man engages is fraught with some "possible element of danger to others. Experience shows that "even from acts apparently innocuous injury to others may "result. The more dangerous the act the greater is the care "that must be taken in performing it. This relates itself to "the principle in the modern law of torts that liability exists only "for consequences which a reasonable man would have foreseen. "One who engages in obviously dangerous operations must be "taken to know that if he does not take special precautions injury "to others may very well result."

Morris L.J.

The evidence showed that if there were an escape from the container there might be an explosive mixture of air and gas. Mr. Rogers, an expert witness called for the plaintiff, in his evidence was asked by the judge: "If it was leaking out into "the air and somebody struck a match, what would happen, "Mr. Rogers? (A.) It would explode if you had an explosive "mixture, my Lord. (Q.) What is the explosive mixture? (A.) "There is a range between 1·86 and 8·41 per cent. calor gas to "air. Below that figure it is not explosive, and above it is too "saturated to explode." That was the nature of the gas which might escape from the cylinder that was left by Mr. Spencer in the vegetable or outer room.

It is important also to see the dimensions of that place. A plan has been put before us which was used during the hearing below. It shows that the approach to the meat room is from the vegetable room. The inner dimensions of the meat room appear to be 9 ft. 6 ins. by about 12 ft., and it would appear that the height of the chamber is some 6 ft. There was a door leading from that inner meat room to the vegetable room, and then a door from the vegetable room which led to the outside air. The evidence shows that when Mr. Beckett went on Tuesday morning he found the door of the vegetable room closed. The plaintiff was asked: "Did you go to the ship on the Tuesday? (A.) Yes.

[28] [1947] A.C. 156. [29] Ibid. 172.

"(Q.) That was the 30th? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Were you actually "at the refrigeration chamber before Edmunds? (A.) Yes. "(Q.) Were there other men working outside the chamber? "(A.) Yes. (Q.) When you arrived was the chamber shut? "(A.) The door was shut but not actually locked. (Q.) Not "locked, but closed? (A.) Yes"; and then he said that he opened the outer door. There appears to have been no evidence whether the door between the vegetable room and the meat room was, or was not, closed.

The next circumstance is the time when Spencer left the calor gas cylinder. He left it on the Friday, but with knowledge that he would not be returning until the Tuesday, but that others would be returning on the Saturday and the Sunday. I would just supplement the citations of the evidence made by my Lord in regard to this matter by referring to one or two other questions and answers. Mr. Spencer was asked: "You knew then, did "you not, that Newalls' men were going to be about all week-"end? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Not only Mr. Edmunds but possibly "Mr. Beckett as well? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And possibly Mr. Fuller-"ton? (A.) Yes. (Q.) They had not been using that cylinder, "had they? (A.) Not to my knowledge." Then a little further on, having said that he had not thought one way or the other whether the men would work in the vegetable room or in the meat room, he was asked this: "When they came into the vegetable "room they would be plastering the whole of the vegetable room? "(A.) Yes, round the rooms. (Q.) And the floor? (A.) I cannot "recollect whether the floor was done or not. (Q.) You would "not dispute Mr. Edmunds if he said they would be doing all "of it, would you? (A.) No. (Q.) And on the floor was the "cylinder, amongst other things? (A.) Yes. (Q.) So clearly if "the floor was to be done the cylinder would have to be moved? "(A.) Yes. (Q.) By Mr. Edmunds or by Mr. Beckett? (A.) I "suppose so."

In those circumstances, it seems to me that Spencer was leaving an article from which gas might escape, if the tap was not fully turned; he was leaving it in a confined place; he was leaving it knowing that others would be there on later days, and that there would be an interval before anyone came, and he was leaving it knowing that it might be necessary for it to be moved.

As I read the judgment of the judge, and particularly the passages to which my Lord has referred, it seems to me clear that the judge exonerated Edmunds from any liability for negligent action, and it seems to me that those findings of the judge were amply warranted by the evidence. There is nothing to suggest that Edmunds did anything wrong in moving the cylinder. Any suggestion that may have been hinted at at one time that Edmunds or Beckett had used the cylinder on the Saturday or the Sunday for some private purpose of their own appears to have been definitely negatived by the judge, and no such suggestion is now persisted in. So it seems to me that Edmunds is ruled out as having been guilty of any negligent act at all. I cannot see any sufficient or satisfactory evidence that there was the presence on the ship of unauthorized persons. That matter rests really on theory or speculation.

C. A.

Morris L.J.

Having regard to all those features of the case, and there being the undoubted fact that there was at some time an escape of gas, and that when Beckett went on the Tuesday morning to the inner chamber, the meat room, he acted without any negligence, any suggestion of contributory negligence on his part having been withdrawn during the hearing, the question arises whether it is shown that there was negligence on the part of someone for whom the refrigeration company are responsible. It is quite plain that Spencer could have done things in a different way. He might have moved the cylinder altogether from the chamber; he might have placed it in some store. That was, perhaps, a course that would not have occurred to him, and I am not saying that it was one that should necessarily have been adopted. He certainly might have put the cap on it. It is true that he said that no cap was supplied to him, but those who employed him could have supplied a cap for fitting on the cylinder.

But, in my judgment, the refrigeration company are responsible for the reason that the evidence leads me to the conclusion that either there was some escape of gas from the Friday afternoon onwards, or that the cylinder was left in such a state that when it was moved, and necessarily moved by someone who moved it without negligence, it would thereafter be in a condition when there would be, or might be, an escape of gas. It has been put by Mr. Marven Everett that if the cylinder was left with some leakage of gas on the Friday afternoon, then it would have been leaking continuously, and he points out that on the Saturday and the Sunday men were working in the vegetable room and were smoking, and on the Sunday were working with candles in the meat room. But that state of affairs is by no means impossible. The vegetable room opened out into the air, and a slight leak of gas might not have caused the necessary concentration in the vegetable room if the door was open continuously or from time to time, as it must have been while men were working there.

In my judgment, the facts lead to the conclusion that the cylinder was either left with an escape of gas, or it was left in such a condition that on its being moved by Edmunds without any negligence, and moved in a way that Spencer must have known was likely, then it would become and be in a condition resulting in an escape of gas. On that basis, in my judgment, the facts lead to the conclusion that there was no liability on the insulation company, but that there was liability on the refrigeration company.

I would therefore agree that the appeal must be allowed to the extent mentioned by my Lord.

Section 3 (2) provided that a used motor-vehicle should not be sold for a sum in excess of the price specified in the permit.

At the request of M. the appellants also paid off the overdraft on his bank account in consideration of his undertaking that the bank would hand over to them as security the deeds relating to certain land which the bank held as security for the overdraft. That was done, but the equitable mortgage of the property constituted by the undertaking and the deposit of the title deeds with the appellants was never registered pursuant to section 22 of the Kumasi Lands Ordinance, 1943, which provided that "No . . . mortgage, whether legal or equitable . . . shall be "of effect until the same is registered. . . ."

Thereafter, M. having given the respondent a cheque in payment of an instalment under his agreement, which was dishonoured, the respondent obtained a judgment against M. for the whole sum due to him. In the course of those proceedings the respondent obtained an interim order for the attachment of the motor vehicles, and shortly afterwards the motor vehicles and trailers comprised in his agreement and certain other motor vehicles, and also M.'s right, title and interest in the land of which the appellants held the title deeds as security for the payment of M.'s overdraft, were attached at the instance of the respondent.

The appellants thereupon issued an interpleader summons under Or. 44, r. 25 (1), of the Supreme Court Rules, Gold Coast, calling on the respondent to show cause why all the properties seized should not be released from attachment on the ground (inter alia) that the vehicles had been in M.'s possession "not on his "own account . . . but on account of, or in trust for some other "person." And following thereon the respondent brought an action against the appellants and M. claiming, inter alia, declarations that the security constituted by his agreement with M. over the motor-vehicles and trailers had priority in law and equity over any security constituted by the deed made between the appellants and M., and that he was entitled to be treated as first mortgagee:—

Held, first, that the mortgage effected by the appellants' deed was not a "sale" within the meaning of the Defence (Control of Transfer of Used Motor-Vehicles) Order, 1943, as amended, for the context in this case required otherwise than that "sell" should include "any transfer," and accordingly the deed was in no way affected by the provisions of the order. At the time, therefore, when the vehicles were seized and attached by the respondent the appellants, who had had no prior notice of the respondent's agreement, had a valid legal mortgage thereon which had priority over the charge created by the respondent's agreement, as the appellants had obtained the legal estate by their deed; that as against the respondent the appellants were entitled to be treated as first mortgagees of the motor vehicles and trailers; and that the vehicles mortgaged to the appellants by their deed were not in the possession of M. "on account of or in trust for" the appellants, but that they could be sold subject to the rights of the appellants as mortgagees under their deed:—

Held, secondly, that the equitable mortgage of the land in favour of the appellants not having been registered in accordance with section 22 of the Kumasi Lands Ordinance, 1943, was of no effect at any material time.

Judgments of the West African Court of Appeal affirmed in part and reversed in part.

F. & M. KHOURY v. PHILIP SAID AZAR.

CONSOLIDATED APPEALS (Nos. 21, 22 and 23 of 1950), by leave of the West African Court of Appeal, from three judgments of that court (Gold Coast Session) Accra (December 13, 1947).

The following introductory statement is taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: These were consolidated appeals from judgments and orders of the West African Court of Appeal in three proceedings, (1) an interpleader summons, the parties to which were the appellants, F. & M. Khoury, one George Bechir Moukarzel (hereafter referred to as "the debtor") and the respondent Azar (hereafter referred to as "Azar"); (2) an action (No. 35 of 1947) in which Azar was plaintiff and the appellants were defendants; (3) an interpleader summons, the parties to which were the appellants, the debtor and the respondents K. Massoud & Sons (hereafter referred to as "Massoud"). Massoud had taken no part in this appeal and the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the third proceeding mentioned above was as follows: "In this case the facts are the "same as in the case of Azar v. G. B. Moukarzel and F. & M. "Khoury, in which judgment has just been delivered in this "court. It having been agreed that the judgment in the present "case should follow that which has been delivered in the other, "there will be judgment in the same terms."

It is unnecessary to refer further to the third proceeding, as it would appear to have been conceded throughout that the case put forward by Massoud must stand or fall with the case put forward by Azar.

The events leading up to the first two proceedings were as follows. On November 16, 1946, the debtor and Azar made an agreement under seal (hereafter called "the first document") for the purpose of securing repayment to Azar of the sum of £4,000 then lent by him to the debtor together with interest thereon, by instalments of £400 each. The first of such instalments fell due on November 30, 1946, and subsequent instalments on the last day of every subsequent calendar month until September 30, 1947, when an instalment of £250 was to be paid. A final instalment of £250 fell due on October 31, 1947. It was provided that in default of any one payment being made when it became due the whole of the said principal sum or so much thereof as then might remain unpaid, together with the interest thereon then due, should become immediately payable.

Repayment was secured by the grant to Azar of certain rights over 14 used motor vehicles and trailers (hereafter called "the "motor vehicles" and "the trailers" respectively) then belonging to the debtor as set out in the schedule to the first document. The rights so granted were (inter alia) on such default of the debtor as aforesaid (a) to require him to transfer to Azar all or any of the motor vehicles and the trailers at a valuation, provided such transfers were approved by the competent authorities, and (b) to seize or take possession thereof, or of any of them, wherever they happened to be, and either then to exercise the right to have such motor vehicles and trailers transferred to him or, in the event of such transfer not being approved as aforesaid or if he did not wish to exercise such right, to retain possession until such time as the principal sum and interest, or so much thereof as might be due at the date of such default, should be paid or until execution should be levied thereon consequent upon any judgment or order obtained by Azar against the debtor in respect of the latter's default under the first document, whichever should first happen.

The debtor further therein covenanted with Azar not to transfer, part with the possession of charge or in any way encumber the motor vehicles and the trailers or any of them.

By a deed dated November 22, 1946, and made between the debtor and the appellants (hereafter called "the second "document") the debtor in breach of his covenant in the first document assigned to the appellants the motor vehicles and the trailers and a large number of other used motor vehicles and trailers by way of security for the payment of the sum of £16,140 and interest thereon and covenanted that he would pay to the appellants the said principal sum together with interest then due by monthly instalments of £1,500 on the last day of each calendar month, the first of such instalments to be paid on December 31, 1946.

The second document contained agreements by the debtor in the following terms:—"(3) That in case the borrower shall "make default in payment of the principal sum by instalments "as aforesaid or of the interest thereon at the times hereinbefore "appointed for payment thereof respectively or in the performance "of any agreement contained herein and necessary for main-"taining this security or shall suffer the said chattels or any of "them to be distrained for rent rates or taxes or if execution "shall during the continuance of this security have been levied "against the goods of the borrower under any judgment at law "then and in such case it shall be lawful for the lenders their "servants or agents without previous notice to the borrower to "seize and take possession of any chattels included in this "security in whatever place or places they may happen to be.

"(4) That if the lenders shall become entitled to seize the "chattels hereby assigned they and their agents may enter and "remain upon any premises where the said chattels may be and "if necessary may break open doors and windows in order to "obtain admission and after the expiration of five clear days "from the day of seizure may sell the said chattels by public "auction or private contract on or off the said premises and retain

" out of the proceeds so much of the said principal sum as may " then remain unpaid and the interest then due and all costs " and expenses which they may incur as aforesaid and the " expenses of sale and also any rent rates and taxes which they " may pay in respect of the premises where the said chattels " may be and the surplus (if any) shall be paid to the borrower."

No permit for the assignment of the motor vehicles effected by the second document was ever obtained or applied for. The Defence (Control of Transfer of Used Motor-Vehicles) Order, 1943, made under regulation 41 of the Defence Regulations, 1939 (hereafter called " the 1943 Order "), as amended by the Defence (Control of Transfer of Used Motor-Vehicles) (Amendment) Order, 1944 (hereafter called " the 1944 Order "), provides inter alia, as follows:—

" 2. In this Order, unless the context otherwise requires—

" ' Purchase ' includes any acquisition of the property in " a used motor-vehicle;

" ' Sell ' includes any transfer of the property in a used " motor-vehicle;

" ' Used motor-vehicle ' means a motor-vehicle as defined in section 2 of the Motor Traffic Ordinance which has at any " time been licensed under that Ordinance for use on a public " highway.

" 3.—(1) No person shall sell or purchase a used motor-vehicle " unless a permit has first been obtained under this Order.

" (2) No person shall sell or purchase a used motor-vehicle for " a sum in excess of the price specified in that behalf in the " permit issued by the competent authority."

" 4—(1) The person intending to sell and the person intending " to purchase a used motor-vehicle shall jointly apply to the " District Transport Control Officer of the district in which either " ordinarily resides for issue of a permit.

" (2) The application, which shall be in the form set forth " in the schedule, shall be made in triplicate.

. . . . . .

" (5) The Director of Supplies, if satisfied that the transfer " of the used motor-vehicles is essential or desirable, shall grant " his permit therefor: and such permit shall be in the form set " forth in the schedule."

Section 2 of the Motor Traffic Ordinance (Chapter 195 of the Laws of the Gold Coast, 1936 Revision) provided as follows:—

" Interpretation.

" In this Ordinance, unless the context otherwise requires:—

" . . . ' Motor-Vehicle ' includes every description of vehicle " propelled by means of mechanism contained within itself, other " than vehicles constructed for use on specially prepared ways " such as railways or tramways."

Before November 28, 1948, there was owing upon overdraft on the debtor's account with the Kumasi Branch of Barclays Bank (Dominion, Colonial and Overseas) the sum of £7,171 15s. 4d., which was secured by an equitable mortgage duly registered in accordance with section 22 of the Kumasi Lands Ordinance, 1943, upon two parcels of land belonging to the debtor and known as plot No. 571 and plot No. 586 Old Town, Section "B," Kumasi. On November 28, 1946, the debtor gave to the appellants an undertaking in the following terms:—

"Accra.
"November 28, 1946.

"F. & M. Khoury,
"Nsawam.

"Dear Sirs,

"In consideration of you paying at my request to Barclays "Bank (D.C. & O.), Kumasi Branch the sum of £7,171 15s. 4d. "(which is the amount now due from me to the bank) I hereby "undertake:—

"(1) To request the bank to hand to you as security such "documents as they possess relating to plot 571 and plot 586, "Old Town Section 'B' Kumasi.

"(2) To deposit with you without delay the title deeds of "property of which I am the lessee situate at Tamale, Bawku, "Navorongo, Bolgatanga, and the document relating to my "interest in plot 105, O.T.B., Kumasi.

"(3) To execute when called on by you a proper legal "mortgage of the properties mentioned in paras. (1) and (2) "above securing the repayment to you of £7,171. The rate of "interest in such mortgage to be 8 per cent. and the principal "to be repaid by me by monthly instalments on the last day of "each month of £1,500. The first such instalment to be paid on "December 31, 1946. I will be permitted to repay at any time "all or any of the principal money due without previous notice.

"(4) To execute a formal bill of sale covering all the transport "and trailers which I at present own together with spare parts "in stock. The bill of sale will be to cover the sum of "£16,140 0s. 0d. and the rate of interest will be 8 per cent. "and with the same provisions as to repayment of principal.

"(5) To hand over to you any sums I may receive from the "P.W.D. in connexion with the hiring by them of my transport."

"Yours faithfully,
"(Sgd.) G. B. MOUKARZEL."

Their Lordships were informed at the opening of the appeal that No. 571 was the only plot as to which any question now arose. The appellants duly paid off the bank overdraft, and the deeds relating to plot 571 were handed over to the appellants by the bank at the request of the debtor, but the debtor never executed a legal mortgage in accordance with head (3) and never executed a bill of sale in accordance with head (4). The equitable mortgage of the properties situated at Kumasi constituted by the undertaking and the deposit of the relevant title deeds with the appellants was never registered pursuant to section 22 of the Kumasi Lands Ordinance, 1943, subsection (1) whereof was in the following terms:— "(1) No lease, transfer, devolution, "mortgage, whether legal or equitable, assignment, underlease or "surrender of land vested in the Asantehene under the provisions "of this Ordinance, shall be of effect until the same is registered "by the Commissioner of Lands, and the fees payable in respect "of any such registration shall be the fees set forth in the eighth "schedule."

On November 30, 1946, the debtor gave Azar a cheque for £400 in payment of the instalment due under the first document on that day, but that cheque was dishonoured on presentation. Azar then attempted to obtain a permit under the 1943 Order for the transfer to him of some of the motor vehicles and the trailers, but the District Transport Control Officer refused to approve such transfers as he had received about the same time several applications for the transfer of the same and other vehicles to other persons.

Accordingly, on December 10, 1946, Azar commenced an action (No. 87 of 1946) against the debtor for repayment of the whole of the moneys secured by the first document. On December 16, 1946, Azar recovered an interim judgment in this action for £3,350, on which final execution was stayed until January 17, 1947, and on December 24, 1946, he recovered a final judgment for a further sum of £691 together with the removal of the said stay.

During the course of that action Azar obtained an interim order for attachment of the 14 motor vehicles on or about December 14, 1946, and shortly thereafter eight or nine of the motor vehicles were so attached. On or shortly after December 24, 1946, at the instance of Azar, the sheriff (acting under a writ of fieri facias pursuant to the provisions of order 43, rule 5) seized and attached all the following property belonging to the debtor to satisfy the said judgment, namely:—

The motor vehicles and the trailers comprised in the first document and certain other motor vehicles and trailers and spare parts; and the debtor's right, title and interest in plot No. 571 and other lands.

The right, title and interest of the debtor in plot 571 was a sub-term of 60 years from March 7, 1945.

On December 16 or 17, 1946, the appellants caused their name or initials to be painted on certain motor vehicles belonging to the debtor which had not been attached under the interim attachment, and on December 17, 1946, the appellants locked up the stores containing the spare parts, took possession of the keys, and wrote on each door "Seized under a Bill of Sale." It would appear, however, that they took no other step to assume possession. On January 4, 1947, the appellants issued an interpleader summons calling on Azar to show cause why all the properties seized should not be released from attachment. The said summons was issued under order 44, rule 25 (1), of the Supreme Court Rules, Gold Coast (c. 4 of Laws of the Gold Coast, 1936, Sch. III), which was in the following terms:—

"25.—(1) In the event of any claim being preferred to, or "objection offered against, the sale of lands, or any other "immoveable or moveable property which may have been attached "in execution of a decree, or under any order for attachment "made before judgment, as not liable to be sold in execution of "a decree against the judgment debtor, the court shall, subject "to the proviso contained in the next succeeding rule, proceed "to investigate the same with the like powers as if the claimant "had been originally made a party to the suit, and if it shall "appear to the satisfaction of the court that the land or other "immoveable or moveable property was not in the possession of "the party against whom execution is sought, or of some person "in trust for him, or in the occupancy of persons paying rent to "him at the time when the property was attached, or that, being "in the possession of the party himself at such time, it was so "in his possession not on his own account, or as his own "property, but on account of, or in trust for some other person, "the court shall make an order for releasing the said property "from attachment. But if it shall appear to the satisfaction of "the court that the land or other immoveable or moveable "property was in possession of the party against whom execution "is sought as his own property, and not on account of any other "person, or was in the possession of some person in trust for "him, or in the occupancy of persons paying rent to him at the "time when the property was attached, the court shall disallow "the claim."

The Supreme Court of the Gold Coast (Smith J.) by its judgment in the interpleader summons delivered on March 19, 1947, held: (a) that the second document created a valid legal mortgage and was not affected by the 1943 Order since that Order was confined to outright sales only and did not prohibit a transfer by way of mortgage; (b) that as the undertaking had not been registered under section 22 of the Kumasi Land Ordinance, 1943, it was of no effect against the debtor's judgment creditors. Other matters were dealt with which were not now in dispute. It was accordingly decided that Azar was entitled to seize in execution plot 571 free from any right, title or interest of the appellants, but was only entitled to seize in execution the motor vehicles and the trailers subject to the appellants' prior mortgage under the second document. From that decision both the appellants and Azar appealed to the West African Court of Appeal.

On March 28, 1947, Azar commenced the above-mentioned action, No. 35 of 1947, in the Supreme Court of the Gold Coast, Ashanti, against the appellants and the debtor, contending that even if the second document was not avoided by the 1943 Order, that Order had the effect of preventing any transfer of a legal interest in the subject-matter thereof, and that the appellants had in any event had notice of the first document at the date of the second document. Judgment in that action was given on June 17, 1947. The court (Smith J.), following its decision on the interpleader summons, held that under and by virtue of the second document the appellants had a first legal mortgage on the motor vehicles and the trailers, the judge not being satisfied that they had taken with notice of the first document, and that accordingly the second document took priority over the first document. He accordingly dismissed the action. From that judgment Azar appealed to the West African Court of Appeal.

In addition to the arguments preferred in the court below, the appellants contended that by reason of their payment off of the moneys secured by the equitable mortgage to Barclays Bank they had acquired a lien on the property therein comprised which ranked in priority to the claims of Azar.

The judgment of the West African Court of Appeal (Sir John Verity C.J., McCarthy and Coussey JJ.) in both matters was delivered on December 13, 1947. On the cross-appeals on the interpleader summons it was held: (a) That the appellants were not entitled to the benefit of the lien for which they contended, because either no such lien ever arose or, if it did, it was waived by accepting the undertaking. (b) That the judgment appealed from was correct in dismissing the appellants' claim in respect of the Kumasi Lands. (c) That the second document was void as contravening the provisions of the 1943 Order. Accordingly the appellants' appeal was dismissed, and the judgment of the court below was upheld in so far as it related to plot 571. The cross-appeal by Azar was allowed in so far as it related to the motor vehicles and the trailers, and judgment was entered for Azar on that part of the claim.

Immediately following those judgments the same court gave judgment upon the appeal in the said action, allowing the appeal and declaring that Azar was entitled to be treated as a first mortgagee and to all the rights and remedies of a first mortgagee, including the right to sell the 14 lorries and 14 trailers described in the first document, and to apply the proceeds in payment of the debt thereby secured. On the question of notice they concurred with the decision of Smith J. From those judgments the appellants appealed.

December 9. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, who stated the facts and statutory provisions set out above and continued:—The arguments put forward before the Board sufficiently appear from the views which their Lordships will now express thereon. Their Lordships will first consider the question whether the mortgage effected by the second document was a purchase or sale of used motor vehicles within the meaning of the 1943 Order as amended by the 1944 Order. It is convenient to quote again paragraph 2 of the 1943 Order: "In this Order, unless the context otherwise "requires . . . 'Sell' includes any transfer of the property in "a used motor-vehicle." It cannot be doubted that the second document might appropriately be described as a transfer of the property in used motor vehicles, as it contains an assignment of the lorries mentioned in the schedule thereto, but in the ordinary use of language it would be quite inappropriate to describe it as a sale. The definition just quoted enlarges the meaning of the word "sell," but in considering whether the definition brings within the scope of the Order any transfer which would not ordinarily be described as a sale, it is necessary to consider whether or not "the context otherwise requires." In their Lordships' view the context "otherwise requires" in the case now under consideration. Paragraph 1 of the 1944 Order provides that it "shall be read as one" with the 1943 Order.

Considering the 1943 Order, as amended, as one document, their Lordships note that paragraph 3 (2) provides: "No person "shall sell or purchase a used motor vehicle for a sum in excess "of the price specified in that behalf in the permit issued by "the competent authority." And paragraph 4 provides that the application, which must be made jointly to the District Transport Control Officer of the District by the person intending to sell and the person intending to purchase a used motor vehicle, "shall be in the form set forth in the schedule." Turning to the schedule in the altered form introduced by the 1944 Order their Lordships observe that the parties are described throughout as "intending vendor" and "intending purchaser," and they note in particular the following portions of the schedule:—

(a) "I, the said ..... (intending purchaser) hereby "declare that—

"(1) The reasons (in full) for intended purchase, are:

"(2) The District in which I propose to use the vehicle "is ....."

[3] (1673) 3 Swans. 536n.
[4] (1862) 10 H.L.C. 191.
[5] [1924] 1 K.B. 431.
[6] (1942) 8 W.A.C.A. 26.

(b) " I recommend that this transfer be/be not approved and " I agree/do not agree to accept the vehicle for petrol in my " District."

" (To be signed by the District Transport Control " Officer of intending purchaser's District.)

(c) " Permission is hereby given for this transfer to take place, " provided that the purchase price of the said vehicle shall not " exceed the sum of £.....

.....
" Director of Supplies
" (Competent Authority)."

In their Lordships' view clause 3 (2) is quite inappropriate to the case of a mortgage. It is difficult to see how in such a case the competent authority could specify the maximum price at which the motor vehicle was to be " sold "; yet it is clearly contemplated by clause 3 (2) that a maximum price is to be specified in the permit. When property is mortgaged no price is paid; the lender lends a sum and the borrower assigns the property by way of security for repayment of that sum. Again, it would be inappropriate, in the case of a mortgage, for the mortgagee to specify " the District in which I propose to use the " vehicle," because it is the usual intention of both parties to a mortgage of motor vehicles that the mortgagor shall remain in possession of the motor vehicles and use them, unless and until the mortgagee takes possession of them under some power contained in the mortgage. The same difficulty arises at the point where the District Transport Control Officer of the intending purchaser's district has to agree or not to agree " to accept the " vehicle for petrol in my District." Further, the concluding words of the schedule link up with clause 3 (2) and seem to give the Director of Supplies no alternative to stating a maximum price in the case of every application.

Paragraph 66 of the Defence Regulations, 1939 (Regulations No. 25 of 1939), imposes severe penalties in the case of any breach of the 1943 Order.

For the reasons already given, and bearing in mind the principle that any real doubt as to the construction of a penal statute should be resolved in favour of the subject, their Lordships hold that the second document is in no way affected by the provisions of the 1943 Order.

The result is that when the sheriff seized the lorries and trailers on December 24, 1946, the appellants had a valid legal mortgage thereon. Counsel for Azar rightly conceded that, if this were so, the charge created by the second document would have priority over the charge created by the first document, as the appellants obtained the legal estate by the second document. Counsel was unable to contend before the Board that the appellants had notice of the first document, in view of concurrent findings of fact to the contrary effect in the courts of West Africa.

J. C.

F. & M. KHOURY v. PHILIP SAID AZAR.

The appellants' next contention was that on December 17 or 18, 1946, they effectively took possession of all the lorries and trailers not included in the interim attachment of December 14, and that they were entitled so to do by virtue of clause (3) of the second document. The words in clause (3) on which counsel for the appellants relied were: "In case the borrower shall make "default in . . . the performance of any agreement contained "herein and necessary for maintaining this security." Counsel contended that by giving Azar a dishonoured cheque for the instalment of £400 which fell due under the first document on November 30, 1946, the debtor had broken an agreement which was to be implied by reason of the terms of the second document, namely, that the borrower would not do any act which would impair or render useless the power to seize contained in clause (3) of the second document. Thereupon, said counsel, the appellants' power to seize arose.

In their Lordships' view there is no substance in this argument. They incline to think that the acts done by the appellants on December 17 or 18 fell short of taking possession of the lorries and trailers, but even if possession was taken, no event had occurred to justify it. Counsel's argument gives no effect at all to the words "contained herein" in clause (3) of the second document. There is a clear contrast between express terms which are "contained in" a document and implied terms, which are not contained in the document, but are to be implied by reason of something contained in the document. Counsel entirely failed to prove any breach by the borrower before December 17, 1946, of any agreement "contained in" the document. There are other reasons why his argument on this point must fail, but their Lordships will refrain from elaborating upon a matter which seems to them plain.

It was next contended for the appellants that even if the debtor was in possession of the lorries and trailers on December 24, 1946, he was in possession "not on his own account, or "as his own property, but on account of, or in trust for" the appellants, within the meaning of order 44, rule 25, already quoted. This argument also must be rejected. A mortgagor in possession of motor vehicles is not a trustee thereof for the mortgagees, nor, if he uses the vehicles for profit, is he bound to account to the mortgagees. Their Lordships were informed at the hearing that some or all of the vehicles in question have been sold, and they think the most convenient course would be to make the first four declarations set out hereafter, giving leave to any party to apply in the Supreme Court of the Gold Coast for the appropriate orders on the footing of these declarations.

There remains only the question whether the appellants had a valid equitable mortgage on plot 571 at the relevant date, or whether the undertaking was ineffective at the relevant date, by reason of section 22 (1) and (2) of the Kumasi Lands Ordinance, 1943. Their Lordships have no doubt that the latter is the correct view. The undertaking was an equitable mortgage of land, and it is not disputed that plot 571 was "land vested in "the Asantahene" under the provisions of the Kumasi Lands Ordinance, 1943. This equitable mortgage was not registered, at any material time, in accordance with section 22 of that Ordinance. Accordingly it was of no effect at any material time, by reason of the provisions of the same section. Counsel for the appellants sought to escape from this difficulty by an argument on the following lines. They said truly that the bank's equitable mortgage was registered in accordance with the section, and they contended that on paying off the bank the appellants "stood in "the shoes of the bank" and were entitled to the benefit of the bank's registered equitable mortgage. To this there are two answers, each of which is fatal to the appellants. In the first place, their Lordships can feel no doubt that the debtor and the appellants both intended the undertaking, and the deposit of deeds pursuant thereto, to be the only security for the debt. The bank's security consisted simply in the deposit of deeds. Once the overdraft had been paid off and the deeds had been handed over the result was that the only security for payment of the debt owing to the appellants was the undertaking, and the deposit of deeds pursuant thereto, and this was plainly the result intended by the parties. In the second place, even if the bank's security could be said to have remained on foot for the benefit of the appellants until December 17, it clearly ceased to have any existence on that date. According to the evidence of the bank manager, which was not contradicted, the Commissioner of Lands was informed on December 17, 1946, that the bank's charge had been paid off. Thereupon the registration of the bank's mortgage would be vacated. Thus it had ceased to have any existence before December 24, 1946, which is the relevant date.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that an order should be made in the following terms:—

The supply of fuel oil to an oil-burning vessel does not fall within the word "equipping" in section 22 (1) (a) (x) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and accordingly where a foreign vessel was under arrest in England to satisfy claims for necessaries, the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction to entertain a claim for the price of fuel oil supplied to her at her port of registry.

MOTION.

The plaintiffs, the Secony Bunker Oil Co. Ld., moved for judgment in default of appearance in respect of the sum of £580 13s. 1d. for fuel oil supplied by the plaintiffs to the steamship D'Vora at the port of Algiers, and for a sum of money due in respect of a quantity of fuel oil supplied to the D'Vora at the port of Haifa, Israel, where the ship was registered.

S. Knox Cunningham for the plaintiffs.

The defendants were not represented, and no decisions were cited.

WILLMER J. I am indebted to Mr. Knox Cunningham for a very interesting argument on what is not an unimportant point, but I am unable to accede to his submission. The result is that in this unopposed motion I am prepared to give the plaintiffs judgment only for the sum of £580 13s. 1d. in respect of the fuel oil supplied to the D'Vora at the port of Algiers. My reasons for coming to that conclusion are as follows: The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, by section 22 (1) (a) (vii),[1] confers admiralty jurisdiction on the court in respect of necessaries supplied (subject to certain provisions) to a ship elsewhere than in the port to which she belongs. But that part of the plaintiffs' claim which I am rejecting is in respect of fuel oil supplied to the ship at Haifa, which is the port at which she was registered. It is, however, contended by Mr. Knox Cunningham that under sub-paragraph (x) of section 22 (1) (a) of the Act the price of fuel oil delivered to the ship at Haifa can be recovered as a claim for the "building, equipping or repairing" of the ship, having regard to the fact that at the time of the institution of this suit the ship was under the arrest of the court.

The sole question to be determined in this case is whether fuel oil supplied to an oil-burning ship comes within the words "building, equipping or repairing." If it does, I have jurisdiction to give judgment for the plaintiffs for the whole amount claimed in this suit; if it does not, then it seems to me that I have no jurisdiction in respect of the fuel oil supplied to the ship at Haifa, but that the plaintiffs must be left to such remedy as they are able to exercise in the ship's own country, namely, Israel.

Clearly, the supplying of fuel oil could hardly come within the words "building" or "repairing." The argument, however, is that it comes within the word "equipping." To my mind, there is, prima facie at least, a wealth of difference between the meaning of the word "equipping" and the meaning of "supplying." A perusal of the Oxford Dictionary has not thrown any great light on the problem which I have to determine. It is to be observed, however, that among the synonyms given for "supply" in the Oxford Dictionary, one does not find the word "equip." In my judgment, there is an important difference between "equip" and "supply," "supply" being a word which is appropriate for use in connexion with consumable stores, such as fuel oil, whereas "equip," to my mind, connotes something of a more permanent nature than consumable stores. I can well understand that anchors, cables, hawsers, sails, ropes, and such things, may be said to be part of a ship's equipment, and that, none the less, though they have to be renewed from time to time; but such things as fuel oil, coal, boiler water and food—consumable stores—seem to me to be in quite a different category.

[1] Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 22 (1): "The High Court shall, in relation to admiralty matters, have the following jurisdiction (in this Act referred to as 'admiralty jurisdiction') . . . (a) jurisdiction to hear and determine any of the following questions or claims:—. . . (vii) any claim for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship, whether within the body of a county or on the high seas, and, unless it is shown to the court that at the time of the institution of the proceedings any owner or part owner of the ship was domiciled in England, any claim for any necessaries supplied . . . elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs; . . . (x) any claim for building, equipping or repairing . . . if at the time of the institution of the proceedings the ship is, or the proceeds thereof are, under the arrest of the court; . . ."

Mr. Knox Cunningham concedes that he can find no authority in support of his proposition that the word "equipment" is wide enough to cover such supplies, or that the word "equip-"ping" is wide enough to cover the supplying of consumable stores, such as fuel oil. I cannot help reflecting on what consequences might follow if I were to decide that the word "equip-"ment" is wide enough to cover the supply of consumable stores. If I were to lay that down as a matter of law in this context, I can well imagine that it might have wide repercussions in quite different fields of the law. Had it been the intention of the legislature that the supply of consumable stores should be included in the jurisdiction conferred under sub-paragraph (x) of section 22 (1) (a) of the Act, it would have been the easiest possible thing for the draftsman to have said so in unambiguous terms; but, as I have already pointed out, he has not done so. Unless consumable stores can be included under the word "equipping" they are not within the ambit of sub-paragraph (x) of section 22 (1) (a) of the Act.

In the result, I am not satisfied by Mr. Knox Cunningham's argument that the supply of consumable goods, such as fuel oil, is covered by sub-paragraph (x) of section 22 (1) (a) of the Act, and, for the reasons that I have stated, I have no jurisdiction to allow so much of his claim as is referable to the fuel oil delivered to the ship at Haifa.

Divorce—Nullity—Presentation of petition by next friend—Alleged insanity of petitioner—Application to dismiss petition supported by petitioner.

A petition for nullity of marriage on the ground that the wife petitioner had not had the capacity to marry by reason of her insanity was presented by the petitioner's niece acting as her next friend. The respondent husband entered an appearance under protest on the ground that the petitioner was not of unsound mind nor suffering from any incapacity which necessitated, or justified, the proceedings being brought by the next friend, and he sought to have the petition dismissed. The petitioner supported his application in an affidavit:—

J. (ORSE. B.) (BY HER NEXT FRIEND) v. J.

SUMMONS (adjourned into court for judgment).

A petition for nullity of marriage on the ground that the petitioner (the wife) was alleged not to have had the capacity to marry by reason of her insanity, or in the alternative that the petitioner was alleged to have been of unsound mind at the time of the marriage, was presented by her next friend, K. E. F. K., on June 9, 1952. On July 24, 1952, a summons was taken out before the registrar for leave to amend the appearance on the respondent husband's behalf to an appearance under protest on the ground that the wife was not a person of unsound mind nor suffering from any incapacity which necessitated or justified the proceedings being brought by K. E. F. K. as next friend. No order was made on that summons save that the cause be stayed pending an application for directions under rule 27 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950.[1]

The matter came before the judge in chambers on July 30, 1952, on an application to stay or, alternatively, to dismiss the cause upon the same ground. The judge accepted the submission that rule 27 did not apply to the question in issue, namely, the wife's sanity at the date of the institution of proceedings. Application was accordingly made for the proceedings to be stayed or dismissed as being an abuse of the process of the court.

The matter came before the judge again on November 3, 1952, after an adjournment, and affidavits were read on behalf of the husband. Those affidavits included one to the wife herself (who was aged about 80 and considerably older than the husband), who stated that she had never requested the next friend or any other person to take proceedings to annul the marriage, that she did not wish the marriage annulled, and that the proceedings had caused her anxiety and distress. She further stated that she had married to protect herself from the unwelcome visits of her relatives, which, she considered, were paid for the purpose of obtaining information as to her estate. Affidavits by the husband and his mother to the same effect were also filed, and there were two affidavits by medical practitioners stating that the wife was a person of sound mind, and in no sense a mental defective, and an affidavit by her solicitor as to interviews with her which satisfied him as to her mental capacity.

(who admitted that he was really appearing in the interests of the next friend) that all that was necessary to entitle a person to institute proceedings such as the present suit in the capacity of next friend was to show a sufficient interest, and that as the next friend in the present case was the wife's niece and had a pecuniary interest, that concluded the matter.

In support of that contention I was referred to Ray v. Sherwood and Ray.[2] In that case it was held that a father qua father had sufficient interest to enable him to bring a suit in the ecclesiastical court, in what was known as the civil form, for the purpose of annulling the marriage of his daughter as being void on the ground of consanguinity. But the father in that case was not acting in the capacity of guardian or next friend. The daughter was of age, and the father was himself the petitioner in his own right, and his title to sustain the suit lay in his having a pecuniary interest owing to his possible liability under the Poor Relief Act, 1601, to maintain the issue of the marriage.

In the present case the petition is that of the petitioner herself, and the issue before me is the authority of the next friend to institute proceedings. It was contended on behalf of the husband that he had a right to put a summary end to the proceedings if no such authority existed. In my opinion, the authorities make it clear that he has such a right.

In Turner v. Meyers,[3] which was a suit to annul a marriage on the ground of insanity, the proceedings were first brought by the husband's father. To this it was objected on the part of the wife that the father had no right to bring such a suit, the son being of age and sui juris, unless appointed committee of his person. The court held that the suit was brought by the father to annul the marriage of a party of competent age, without setting up any special interest, but averring the insanity of the son at the time. The only question was whether the person before the court was the proper person to plead it. It was not alleged that the son was insane at the institution of the suit, and he must be presumed sane, and as such capable of bringing suits proprio jure. No one could be attorney or procurator for him but by his own appointment, and in fact the husband had taken no steps to annul the marriage, but rather adhered to it. It was held that therefore the father had not a persona standi before the court, and his suit was dismissed.

In Fry v. Fry[4] the facts were that the parties were married in June, 1889; in November of that year a son of the wife by a former marriage obtained from the registrar an order under what was then rule 196 assigning him to be his mother's guardian ad litem for the purpose of promoting a suit declaring her marriage with the respondent to be void on the ground that she was insane at the time of its being solemnized. wife moved to rescind that order, adducing evidence to show that she was of sound mind. Butt J. discharged the order, holding that an order under the rule assigning a guardian ad litem to a person alleged to be of unsound mind should not be made where there was a bona fide and substantial dispute as to the insanity of the party.

That order was appealed from.[5] In his judgment Cotton L.J. said[6]: "This is an appeal from an order of Butt, J., discharging "an ex parte order of the registrar assigning a guardian ad litem "to a person alleged to be of unsound mind. I will not give any "opinion on the question whether, on the evidence before us, she "was of unsound mind at the date of her marriage, or whether "she is so now, for I go upon this ground, that an order ought "not to be made under rule 196 for assigning a guardian ad litem "where there is a bona fide dispute whether at the time of the "application the party is of unsound mind. The question is "whether the court shall give to some other person the conduct "of a suit, on the ground that this lady is incapable of acting for "herself, and I think the court ought not to do so where there "is a bona fide dispute whether she is not capable of acting for "herself. I do not at present feel disposed to assent to the view "of Lopes, L.J., that this rule only applies to the case of a person "found lunatic by inquisition. The rule applies equally to a "party suing and to a party defending, and it would be very "serious to hold that, if a person of unsound mind is sued, no "defence can be put in till he has been found lunatic by inquisi-"tion; but, where there is a bona fide dispute as to the sanity "of the party, I think that an order for a guardian ad litem ought "not to be made. The medical evidence adduced in support of "the application to discharge the registrar's order shews that "there is reasonable ground for contending that this lady is "capable of managing her own affairs. I think, therefore, that "the appeal must be dismissed, not on the ground that the "registrar was wrong in making the order on the materials before "him, but on the ground that the evidence adduced before the "judge shewed that the case was not one in which such an order "ought to have been made."

Lindley L.J. gave judgment to the same effect, and after stating shortly the facts he went on to say[7]: "It would be "monstrous if a self-appointed guardian was allowed to go on "with such a suit when a defence like that is made. The son "may apply for an inquisition, and if she is found lunatic by "inquisition the committee can sue, and if no committee is "appointed a suit may be promoted by a guardian ad litem."

Lopes L.J., at the end of his judgment, said[8]: "As regards "the other point, assuming the rule to apply to the case, I agree "with the Lords Justices that the power given by it ought not " to be exercised where there is a bona fide dispute as to " sanity."

The question arose in a different form in Richmond v. Branson & Son.[9] That was an action by a plaintiff described as " of " unsound mind not so found," by her next friend against a firm of solicitors for delivery up of certain deeds and documents of title deposited by her with them as her solicitors, it being alleged that she was, and had for many years been, insane. By their defence the defendants admitted possession of the documents, but pleaded that she was not at any material time a person of unsound mind. On a motion by the plaintiff to strike out so much of the defence as did not admit the unsoundness of mind of the plaintiff, and for judgment on the admissions in the defence, Warrington J. held that the defendants by raising the issue as to unsoundness of mind were in effect denying the authority of the plaintiff's solicitors to bring the action, and that was not an issue which it was competent to them to raise at the trial of the action. The important part of the judgment, so far as the present question is concerned, is where Warrington J. said [10]: " If there were nothing " else, the plaintiff would, in my opinion, upon these admissions, " plainly be entitled to judgment against the defendants for " delivery up of those documents to the person she indicates as " the person to receive them. The defendants, however, set " up, or attempt to set up, as an issue in the action the question " whether or not the plaintiff is in fact of unsound mind. In other " words, they dispute the authority of the solicitors instructed by " the next friend, and that of the next friend himself, to institute " the action. Now is that an issue which it is competent to the " defendants to raise at the trial? In my opinion it is not. The " action, in whatever form it is brought, is the action of the " plaintiff. If a solicitor is acting without authority in an action " brought by a plaintiff who is not alleged to be of unsound mind, " either the plaintiff or the defendant is entitled to have that " action summarily stayed, and to an order that the solicitor " should pay the costs of the action as between solicitor and " client. There is really, in principle, no distinction between an " action brought by a plaintiff of unsound mind, or alleged to be " of unsound mind, by her next friend, and an action brought by " an ordinary plaintiff. In both cases the real question, if there " is any question at all, is that of the authority of the solicitor. " Of course, in the case of a person suing by a next friend there " is the further question of the authority of the next friend, and " in those cases it is competent either to the plaintiff himself, " that is to say the person who is assumed to be non compos " mentis or not sui juris, or to the defendants to put a summary " end to the proceedings, and, in the case of a next friend, he " also would be subject to an order to pay the costs."

In my opinion, therefore, the husband is entitled to have the suit dismissed if it can be shown that there is reasonable ground for supposing that the wife is capable of managing her own affairs. At the present moment the evidence as to this is all one way, but I was informed that the legal advisers of the wife's next friend were under a misapprehension as to the necessity of bringing evidence at the adjourned hearing, and I will therefore afford them an opportunity of filing affidavits in answer to those which have been filed on behalf of the respondent.

Company — Dividends — Underpayment to cumulative preference shareholders due to erroneous method of computation—Aggregate sum representing deficiency of dividends—How distributable.

Between the years 1939 and 1951, the holders of "B" cumulative preference shares in a company, whose dividends ranked in priority to those of the holders of junior issues of shares and stock, received dividends on a certain basis. In 1948 the correctness of the method of computation was challenged and it was held, in legal proceedings, that such method was erroneous, and that the holders of "B" shares had been underpaid since 1939. An action was begun by the company to determine (1) from what date the dividend must be regarded as being deficient (1939 or 1948); (2) to whom the balance of the dividend ought to be distributed; and (3) the rate of income tax which the company was entitled to deduct when making the distribution:—

Held, (1) that, before any further distribution of profits was made, the amount by which the payment of the dividend in respect of the "B" shares over the period from 1939 fell short of the sum which ought to have been paid should first be distributed; (2) that the aggregate sum was divisible exclusively among the holders of "B" shares appearing as such on the register of members at the time of the declaration of the dividend, by which the aggregate sum would thus be distributed; (3) that the rate of income tax which the company was entitled to deduct, when distributing the aggregate sum by way of dividend, was the standard rate in force when the dividend was declared.

GODFREY PHILLIPS LD. v. THE INVESTMENT TRUST CORPORATION LD.

SPECIAL CASE.

The plaintiff company, Godfrey Phillips Ld., sought the opinion of the court on certain questions of law arising out of the decision of the House of Lords in Friends Provident & Century Life Office v. Investment Trust Corporation Ld.,[1] in an appeal in which the second and third defendants were appellants and the first defendant and the company were respondents. That decision determined the correct mode of computing the cumulative dividend payable on the " B " cumulative preference shares of the company. The effect of that decision was that the dividend must be regarded as having been underpaid for several years past and the questions on which the company now desired to obtain the opinion of the court were (a) from what date the dividend must be regarded as being deficient; (b) whether the balance of the dividend should be distributed among the holders of the said shares registered at the respective times when the deficient dividends were paid or paid wholly to those registered at the time when the said balance was hereafter paid; and (c) a question relating to the rate of income tax to be deducted when the distribution was made.

The present issued share capital of the company is £2,365,990 divided into 250,000 cumulative preference shares of £1 each, 300,000 " B " cumulative preference shares of £1 each, 300,000 " C " cumulative preference shares of £1 each, £1,431,827 ordinary stock and 841,630 ordinary shares of 2s. each. All the said shares are fully paid up. The ordinary shares and ordinary stock rank pari passu in all respects.

The rights conferred on the holders of the respective classes of shares are set out in article 5 of the present articles. The rights conferred on the holders of the " B " cumulative preference shares have been in the same form ever since they were created and issued in 1919.

By article 5 (A) (ii), it was provided: " The ' B ' cumulative " preference shares confer the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at such rate that after deduction of income tax " thereon at the current rate for the time being (irrespective of " any allowance or rebate in the case of a particular shareholder) " the amount remaining shall be the clear sum of 6 per cent. " per annum on the capital paid up thereon less the amount " of any income tax for the time being payable in excess of " 6s. in the £ computed on the gross sum of 6 per cent. per " annum on such capital, such dividend to rank next after the " dividend payable in respect of the said 250,000 cumulative " preference shares and in priority to the dividend on the said " 300,000 ' C ' cumulative preference shares and also on the " ordinary shares for the time being of the company, but to no " further right to participate in the profits of the company."

[1] [1951] W.N. 476 ([1951] 2 All E.R. 632).

The standard rate of income tax first rose above 6s. in the £ for the fiscal year 1939/40 and has remained above that rate ever since. From 1939 until April 30, 1951, the company calculated the dividend on the " B " shares in accordance with the following example for a holding of 100 shares, a dividend for a full year and a standard rate of tax of 9s. in the £.

| | £ | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 6 per cent. on 100 shares of £1 each ..... | 6 | 0 | 0 |
| Equivalent to gross (at 6s. in the £) ..... | 8 | 11 | 5 |
| Less income tax at 6s. in the £ ..... | 2 | 11 | 5 |
| | 6 | 0 | 0 |
| Less income tax at 3s. in the £ calculated on gross sum of £8 11s. 5d. ..... | 1 | 5 | 8 |
| Net dividend to shareholder | 4 | 14 | 4 |

In 1948 a holder of " B " cumulative preference shares challenged this method of computation, and, as a result of proceedings instituted in the Chancery Division for a declaration as to the true construction of article 5 (A) (ii), the effect of the above-mentioned decision of the House of Lords was that the dividend on the " B " cumulative preference shares ought to be computed in the following manner:—

| | £ | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|---|
| 6 per cent. on 100 shares of £1 each ..... | 6 | 0 | 0 |
| Less income tax at 3s. in the £ to be borne by the shareholders and being the excess of the standard rate of tax over a rate of 6s. in the £ calculated on £6 ..... | | 18 | 0 |
| Net dividend to shareholder | 5 | 2 | 0 |

For every year in which the dividends on the " B " cumulative preference shares were underpaid, the dividend on the " C " cumulative preference shares (which rank subsequently to the " B " shares) was paid in full, and interim and final dividends were paid on the ordinary stock and shares.

Notices of annual general meetings of the company held before the year 1951, were not sent to holders of the " B " cumulative preference shares, and the holders thereof did not, during the period between 1939 and 1950 inclusive, vote as such on any resolutions of the company in general meeting, except the special resolution adopting the present articles.

The plaintiff company claimed by their writ:—

(1) A declaration that, in calculating the aggregate sum which ought to be paid to the holders of the " B " cumulative preference shares in the capital of the company, as representing the

(2) Alternatively, a declaration that the relevant payment was that made on October 31, 1939 . . . [the date of the half-yearly payment made next after the standard rate of income tax first rose above 6s. in the £.]

(3) A declaration that the said aggregate sum was divisible exclusively amongst the holders of the said "B" cumulative preference shares appearing as such on the register of members of the plaintiff company at the time of payment of the said aggregate sum.

(4) Alternatively, a declaration that so much of the said aggregate sum as represents the deficiency of a particular half-yearly payment of the said dividend was divisible amongst the persons who appeared as holders of the said "B" cumulative preference shares on the said register at the time when that half-yearly payment was paid, whether or not such persons should appear as such at the time of payment of the said aggregate sum.

(5) A declaration that the rate of income tax which the plaintiff company was entitled to deduct from the said aggregate sum was the standard rate in force at the date of payment thereof.

(6) Alternatively, a declaration that the rate of income tax which the plaintiff company was entitled to deduct from so much of the said aggregate sum as represented the deficiency of a particular half-yearly payment of the said dividend was the standard rate in force at the date when that half-yearly payment was paid.

GODFREY PHILLIPS LD. v. THE INVESTMENT TRUST CORPORATION LD.

December 10. WYNN-PARRY J. read the following judgment:—

I propose to deal first with paragraphs 1 and 2 of the writ, which ask for alternative declarations.

[After summarizing paragraphs 1 and 2 of the writ and referring to Friends Provident and Century Life Office v. Investment Trust Corporation Ld.[6] his lordship continued:] It is well established that, in respect of a right to dividend on a share, no debt is created until a dividend is declared. Over the maximum period involved, which goes back to October 31, 1939, too small a dividend was declared on each occasion. In respect of each dividend actually declared a debt was created in favour of each holder of "B" preference shares; but in respect of what I may call "the shortfall," on no such occasion was any debt created. Full effect was not given to the rights of the holders of the "B" preference shares, but the continued existence of those rights was not affected by reason of such failure.

It follows that, apart from any question of waiver or estoppel, which I will consider later, the holders of the "B" preference shares could insist as against the company and the holders of the shares and stock of the inferior classes that, before any further distribution of profits should be made, the amount by which the payment of dividend in respect of the "B" preference shares over the period from October 31, 1939, was short should first be distributed in respect of those shares.

It is argued, however, that having regard to the facts set out in the special case, outside which, of course, I cannot go, the holders of the "B" preference shares cannot so insist, because they have barred themselves by acquiescence or laches or waiver or are estopped from asserting their right so as to insist in respect of any earlier period than that beginning on October 31, 1948. In his argument, Mr. Goff, who appeared for the holders of the "C" preference shares and of ordinary shares and stock, sought to rely on Matthews v. Great Northern Railway Co.,[7] the headnote of which reads as follows: "By an Act of Parliament it "was enacted, that it should be lawful for any shareholder who "should have paid up one half the amount of any share or "shares of the G. N. R. Co., to require each share to be con-"verted into two half-shares, whereof the one half which should "be so fully paid up should be denominated deferred half-"share, and the other half of such share should be denominated "guaranteed half-share; and thenceforth in respect of each "whole share so divided, the whole of the interest and dividends "which would in each year have accrued should be applied in or "towards payment, in the first place, of interest or dividend "after the rate of £6 per cent. per annum on the amount paid "upon the half-share so denominated 'guaranteed,' and the "remainder, if any, should alone be payable to the half-share "so denominated 'deferred,' provided that the company should "not pay any other or greater amount of interest or dividend "upon the two half-shares than was for the time being paid on "each undivided share:—Held, upon the construction of this "section, that the holders of guaranteed half-shares were "entitled to be paid their £6 per cent. in each year not only "out of the dividends accruing in that year, but out of all "subsequent dividends; and, therefore, if in any year the divi- "dends were more than sufficient to pay £6 per cent. on the "guaranteed half-shares, the surplus must be applied in pay- "ment, in the first place of all arrears due on those half-shares "in respect of past deficiencies before any dividend could be "declared on the deferred half-shares.

"The holders of the guaranteed half-shares having in a "former year acquiesced in the declaration of a dividend on the "deferred half-shares, whilst there was an arrear of dividend due "on the guaranteed half-shares,—Held, that although they had "precluded themselves from making any claim in respect of "those particular arrears, they had not thereby renounced their "rights in respect of subsequent arrears."

The argument for the defendants is reported as follows: "Mr. Rolt, Mr. Denison and Mr. T. Stevens, for the defendants, "contended that, according to the true construction of the Act "of Parliament of 1848, the guaranteed dividends for each year "were to be made good only out of the dividends declared for "that year, and if in any year there was not sufficient to pay "£6 per cent. the holders of B stock were not entitled to have "the arrears paid up out of dividends declared in subsequent "years. This construction was acquiesced in in 1854, and could "not now be dissented from."

Most of the judgment of Wood V.-C. was devoted to a consideration of the scope of the rights of the holders of the guaranteed half-shares and the deferred half-shares. Towards the end of his judgment, however, he says this: "Then comes "the question of laches. It does not appear that I can hold "parties to be precluded, because they stand by acquiescing in "a certain sense, that is to say, not asserting their rights upon "a construction adverse to their view taken by the directors as "it was taken in the report of 1854. When I say adverse, I do "not quite coincide with what Mr. Denison urged, that it does "not appear that there was any assertion of right. The directors "announced their view, and nobody said anything. They were "content to take their dividend. Upon that I hold that they "cannot call back the dividends which have been paid down to "that time, but I do not think that that precludes them for all "time from saying that they have not renounced their rights, or "that the persons who may have bought A shares with the "notion that their rights were different from what the court has "now held them to be, can say to the B shareholders, You "who, rather than go into litigation, acquiesced in having the "money, which might have been paid in a particular way, " appropriated in a different way during a certain period of time, " are therefore bound in all time to give up that right. There is " nothing in the shape of misrepresentation or fraudulent holding " out to make me say, there is an equity to be fastened on all the " B shareholders for all time by reason of their acquiescing in " the view which might have been then taken."

It is to be observed that in the argument it was urged that there had been acquiescence in the past, but that this was put forward with a view to sustaining the point that such acquiescence operated to alter the rights of the holders of the guaranteed stock for the future. The Vice-Chancellor's judgment proceeds on the basis that there had been acquiescence as regards the prior period, for which conclusion he gives no express reason, but that such acquiescence could not affect the future. He treats it as a case in which a plea of laches could have been advanced against any attempt to " call back " the dividend, to use his own phrase.

I have felt it necessary to refer to that case, because, as I have said, it was relied on in argument, and because the doctrine of acquiescence appears to have been relied on by the Vice-Chancellor. It is not, however, necessary for me, I think, to say more about that case than this; that in my view it does not touch the present case, in which neither acquiescence nor laches can, to my mind, play any part. The matter may be tested in this way. So long as no dividend or an insufficient dividend is declared, a " B " preference shareholder has no right to sue for the recovery of any money. His only right would be to sue for a declaration that the company is not entitled to pay any dividend on any inferior class of shares without first satisfying in full the rights of the holders of " B " preference shares, and for an injunction on the footing of such a declaration. Such an action would be for the enforcement of a legal right, and the injunction would be sought merely in aid of that legal right. Now where an injunction is sought merely in aid of a legal right, then lapse of time, unaccompanied by anything else, does not bar the right to the injunction, at any rate at the trial of the action, unless it would have barred the corresponding action at law. (See Birmingham Canal Co. v. Lloyd,[8] Great Western Railway Co. v. Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Railway Co.,[9] and Fullwood v. Fullwood.[10])

In such a claim as I am considering, no statutory period of limitation would be applicable, and, therefore, prima facie, the holders of " B " preference shares would be entitled to maintain their claim in respect of the amount by which they have been underpaid.

It was argued that either they must be taken to have waived their rights as regards past years, or else as regards those years they would be estopped from asserting their rights. As regards waiver, I can find nothing in the special case to indicate that there has been anything in the nature of waiver. As regards estoppel, it is clear that the holders of " B " preference shares could not be precluded from asserting the true construction of the articles of association, because that construction has been pronounced on by the House of Lords and must apply for the future. Even if an estoppel could be pleaded in respect of the past years, I am unable to see how it could be established on the evidence in the special case and the accompanying documents. I cannot find any such representation of fact as would be necessary to found an estoppel, nor, assuming that difficulty to be overcome, is there any sufficient evidence that the company altered its position to its detriment.

An argument was advanced on behalf of the holders of " B " preference shares, who have parted with their shares, which I had great difficulty in following. It involved the assertion, no doubt in a writ, by such a holder that the company owed him the amount by which he had been underpaid in the past as a debt presently payable. This assertion the argument admitted was completely false; but it was contended that the company could not, itself, assert the falsity. Apparently, the action would have progressed by the company putting in a defence pleading that no dividend had been declared; whereupon the ex-" B " preference shareholder would have put in a reply pleading that the company was estopped from setting up the plea of no declaration of dividend. This analysis must demonstrate the hopelessness of such an argument, because it involves completely forgetting that estoppel can only be a matter of defence and cannot be used, even in a reply, to found a cause of action.

I therefore conclude that the relevant payment was that made on October 31, 1939, and I shall therefore make a declaration in the sense of paragraph 2 of the writ.

I now proceed to deal with paragraphs 3 and 4 of the writ, which raise the question whether the aggregate sum to which I have referred is divisible exclusively among the holders of the " B " preference shares appearing as such on the register of members of the company at the time of payment of the aggregate sum, or whether, in fact, persons who were holders of " B " preference shares during the material period, but who have sold them, are entitled to share in such distribution in the manner specified in paragraph 4 of the indorsement on the writ.

Subject as below mentioned, in my view, this question must be answered in the former sense, for the simple reason that when the aggregate sum is distributed, the distribution will—as, indeed, it must—take the form of a dividend, and although that dividend will be calculated by reference to a period extending back to October, 1939, it will be a dividend solely in respect of the year in which profits are declared for division, the amount being by virtue of article 5, as construed by the House of Lords, determined by the whole amount of the aggregate sum: see In re

Wakley.[11] Such a dividend could only be paid to those persons who are registered as the holders of "B" shares at the time of the declaration of the dividend. I shall, therefore, make a declaration in the sense of paragraph 3 of the indorsement on the writ, but the declaration will refer to the time of the declaration of the dividend by which the aggregate sum is distributed instead of to the time of payment of the aggregate sum.

As regards paragraphs 5 and 6 of the indorsement on the writ, it follows from what I have said in dealing with paragraphs 3 and 4 that the rate of income tax which the company is entitled to deduct when distributing the aggregate sum by way of dividend is the standard rate in force when the dividend is declared.

Sale of goods—Contract—No memorandum in writing—Commission to make fur coat—Whether contract for work and labour or sale of goods—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 4 (1).

The defendant, on behalf of his wife, ordered from the plaintiffs, a firm of furriers, a mutation mink coat. The defendant's wife selected skins of the colour she desired and specified the style of coat she required, directing that it should be made with the skins running horizontally. Her instructions were carried out, but the coat was eventually rejected by her. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant claiming £950 for work done and materials supplied in the making of the coat. By his defence the defendant pleaded that the contract was one for the sale of goods of the value of £10 or over and was unenforceable pursuant to section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, by reason of the fact that there was no note or memorandum in writing of the contract signed by the party to be charged or his agent:—

Held, that although a high degree of skill and craftsmanship might be required in the making of the coat, the contract was no more than one for the making of an article for the special use of the customer by someone whose business it was to make it. The nature of the transaction, therefore, was that it was one for the making and supply of a particular article at a price and not one for work and labour done and materials supplied, and there being no memorandum in writing to satisfy the requirements of section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the contract was unenforceable.

ACTION.

The evidence given on behalf of the plaintiffs was to the following effect:—The plaintiffs, Marcel (Furriers) Ld., were retail furriers with a shop in New Bond Street, where they kept a stock of furs ready made up for sale and also made up furs for customers. In May, 1951, the defendant, one Tapper, and his wife called at the plaintiffs' showroom for the purpose of ordering a mutation mink coat for Mrs. Tapper. Mutation mink is a cross-bred, farm bred mink and the crossing produces skins in various shades of colours known by various designations. Mrs. Tapper chose a fur of a colour known as "Royal Pastel" and then selected the style of coat she desired, namely, a hip-length jacket, and asked that the coat should be made with the skins running horizontally. J. Marcel, the managing director of the plaintiff firm, was of opinion that the suggested way of making the coat was not suitable in the case of mutation mink. Mrs. Tapper, however, insisted on the coat being made as she desired, and her instructions were duly carried out. Eventually the defendant and his wife refused to accept the coat.

On June 24, 1952, the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendant in which they claimed £950 as the amount alleged to be due and owing for work done and materials supplied in respect of a hip-length mutation mink jacket (Royal Pastel). By his defence, the defendant denied that the plaintiffs did any work for, or supplied any materials to, him at his request, and in the alternative pleaded that, if the facts alleged by the plaintiffs were well-founded, any obligation arising therefrom was an obligation under a contract of sale of goods of the value of £10 or upwards and was not enforceable against the defendant by virtue of section 4 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, in view of the fact that there was no note or memorandum in writing of the contract signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf.

R. F. Levy Q.C. and Leonard Caplan, for the plaintiffs, cited Clay v. Yates,[1] Lee v. Griffin[2] and Robinson v. Graves.[3]

Morris Finer for the defendant.

At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case Hilbery J. said that, assuming the facts of the case to be as set out above, and without hearing evidence for the defendant, he was prepared to deliver judgment on the question of law raised by the defendant in his defence.

HILBERY J. The question which I have to determine is whether or not the substance of the contract in this case was that it was a contract for skill and labour to be exercised for the production of the article, or whether it was a contract for the production of something to be sold to the customer. If the claim falls within the first of those two classes, then section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, does not apply. If, however, it comes within the second class, then section 4 applies, as was held in Lee v. Griffin.[4] That case was considered in Robinson v. Graves,[5] and in speaking of the two classes into which this transaction might be said to fall I was paraphrasing a passage in the judgment of Greer L.J. in the last-mentioned case. It is somewhat significant that the present case is almost exactly the same as that of a man going to his tailor and ordering a suit of clothes, and it is observable that in Lee v. Griffin,[6] which was concerned with the supply of a set of artificial teeth, Crompton J. at the end of his judgment said: "Here, however, the subject matter of the "contract was the supply of goods. The case bears a strong "resemblance to that of a tailor supplying a coat, the measure-"ment of the mouth and fitting of the teeth being analogous to "the measurement and fitting of the garment."

There is no doubt that a high degree of skill and craftsmanship goes into the making up of a fur jacket such as was to be made for the defendant in this case. It was really a case, however, of no more than making an article for sale to the defendant on his special order, and I cannot discover anything to distinguish it from the case of an ordinary article which it is part of someone's business to supply and which that person has to make to special measurements for the customer. It requires skill, labour and material, of course, to make it, but the purpose of the transaction is the supply of the complete article for the price; and that is exactly what it was here. The invoice which was sent reads: "Hip-length mutation mink jacket (Royal Pastel) £950." It is an article for which £950 is demanded, and it is the invoice price of the article. It is not a charge made for work and labour done and materials supplied, coupled with the addition of the necessary sum for the purpose of tax.

In the circumstances of the present case, although section 4 is not a plea to which a court gives effect with any feeling that it is doing what, in the ordinary sense of the word, is justice, none the less, in upholding the plea, it is doing what is justice according to law and I am bound to give effect to it. I think that the plaintiffs' claim must fail and that there must be judgment for the defendant.

Legal Aid—Costs—Divorce—No order for costs inter partes—Order for taxation as between solicitor and client—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (12 & 13 Geo. 6, c. 51), Sch. III—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1359), reg. 18 (3).

The court has power to order a taxation of an assisted person's costs as between solicitor and client although no order for costs is made inter partes.

At the end of a matrimonial cause in which a wife's petition for a judicial separation on the ground of cruelty had been dismissed, Willmer J. decided that no order should be made for costs inter partes. It was further ordered that the sum of £25 security in court should be paid out. The wife was an assisted person, but the husband was not. His Lordship referred to Metcalf v. Wells [1] and raised the question whether he had power to make an order in accordance with regulation 18 (3) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950,[2] for the taxation of the wife's costs as between solicitor and client.

Norman Williams, for the wife, referred to Brown v. Brown [3] and submitted that the court had such power.

Ian S. Warren for the husband.

WILLMER J. So far as an order for costs between the parties is concerned, in my judgment this is not a proper case in which to make any order. I am informed that there is in fact £25 security in court; but bearing in mind that the wife is an assisted person under the legal aid scheme, it does not seem to me that the wife's solicitors need the protection of an order for costs, even up to the amount of the security. Indeed, with the arrival of the legal aid scheme it may be said that the most important reason for ordering security for a wife's costs has disappeared. At any rate, I do not propose to make any order against the husband in this case. That being so, as between the parties there will be no order as to costs.

On that basis, I was a little troubled by a decision of Roxburgh J. in Metcalf v. Wells.[4] According to the report it would appear that the judge decided that, where no order for costs inter partes was made in a case to which the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, applied, the result was that regulation 18 (3) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, was not brought into force; and he appears to have expressed the view that, apart from that regulation, there was no other regulation requiring or empowering the court to make an order for taxation of the assisted person's costs against the fund. In that particular case he refused to do so, but his attention does not seem to have been called to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Brown v. Brown,[5] which I have had the opportunity of considering. That decision makes it quite plain that even where no order for costs inter partes is made, the court, if the whole purpose of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, is not to be defeated, must at least have power to order a taxation against the fund. One of the members of the court took the view that "no order as to costs" amounted to the same thing as an order for the payment of costs, so as to bring regulation 18 (3) into operation and make it obligatory to order a taxation. It is not necessary for me to express any opinion whether that is the right view, or whether the proper view is that the court is merely empowered to make an order, i.e., has a discretion to do so.

Even assuming the latter view to be the correct one, I feel satisfied that this is a case in which I ought to make an order if I have a discretion to do so.

It is true that I made some comments in the course of my judgment yesterday to the effect that a great amount of costs had been expended over this case for a very small result, because the effect of the relief asked for, even if obtained, would make very little difference to the position of the parties. I pointed out that the relief claimed did not involve any change of status. Even so, I think that Mr. Williams' reply to that comment is unanswerable, namely, that his client had a legal right to bring her case before this court. It is not a case in which one could say that she never had any grounds for taking proceedings; and if she had such grounds, the matter could only be determined by fighting the case and obtaining the finding of the court.

That being so, I certainly cannot say that the solicitors were guilty of anything in the nature of improper conduct in continuing to present the petition, even though it failed; it is only right, therefore, that they should have the protection of the Act, and should be given their appropriate opportunity of recovering their costs.

Accordingly, I direct that there shall be the usual taxation as between solicitor and client, according to Sch. III. There will be an order for payment out of the £25 security to the husband's solicitors.

* EAST MIDLANDS GAS BOARD v. DONCASTER CORPORATION.

Nationalization—Gas—Acquisition of undertaking of local authority—General rate fund—Claim by gas board for amounts debited in gas undertaking accounts and credited in other accounts—Determination of claim by Minister of Health—Ouster of jurisdiction—Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926 (16 & 17 Geo. 5, c. xxvii), ss. 71, 72, 73, 75—Local Government Act, 1933 (23 & 24 Geo. 5, c. 51), s. 185—Gas Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 37 (1) (2).

The Gas Act, 1948, which made provision for the compulsory acquisition of gas undertakings throughout the country and for the vesting of them in gas boards on May 1, 1949, provided by section 37 (1) that where after February 10, 1948, a local authority had without the approval of the Minister of Health debited any amount in the accounts of its gas undertaking and credited such amounts in any other of its accounts, the local authority should be liable to pay that amount to the appropriate gas board; and by section 37 (2) that any claims by such gas board should be made within 12 months from the vesting date, and if not settled by agreement, should be determined by the Minister of Health.

The defendants, a local authority, after February 10, 1948, debited two amounts shown in the separate account of their gas undertaking and credited those amounts to their general rate fund revenue account and their water undertaking revenue account respectively, but contended that all those accounts were constituent parts of their general rate fund. The plaintiffs, the appropriate area gas board, claimed the two amounts under section 37 (1) within the statutory period of 12 months; and the claim not being settled by agreement was under subsection (2) determined by the Minister and in favour of the gas board:—

Held, that the claim being a claim under section 37 (1) made within the statutory period, and having been determined by the Minister under subsection (2), the court had no jurisdiction to determine whether it was a valid claim under the section.

Semble: Where a local authority, acting in accordance with statutory requirements, have after February 10, 1948, kept separate accounts for, inter alia, a gas undertaking and for general rates and other accounts (although they may all be parts of the general rate fund), and at the material time revenue from the gas undertaking has not been merged in the other accounts, section 37 (1) is clearly applicable to debits of amounts in the gas account and credits of those amounts to other accounts.

North-Eastern Gas Board v. Leeds Corporation [1952] 2 T.L.R. 536 ([1952] 2 All E.R. 326) referred to.

ACTION.

By section 17 of the Gas Act, 1948, the gas undertaking of the defendants, the Doncaster Corporation, vested in the plaintiffs, the East Midlands Gas Board, as the appropriate area board constituted under the Act, on May 1, 1949.

On a date or dates after February 10, 1948, the corporation, without the approval of the Minister of Health, debited sums of £8.487 2s. 9d. and £2,144 0s. 3d. shown in the separate account of their gas undertaking and credited them to the surplus account of the general rates fund and the water undertaking of the corporation respectively.

The gas board claimed each of the sums under section 37 (1) of the Gas Act, 1948,[1] which provided for the "control of dividends and interest and safeguarding of assets pending transfer" of all gas undertakings to the appropriate gas boards. The claim was made on August 23, 1949, in a letter to the Town Clerk of Doncaster, and further correspondence took place, but the claim was not settled by agreement. Accordingly each party formulated their case in documents of March 15, 1950, and June 6, 1950, which were laid before the Minister of Health. The Minister, in pursuance of subsection (2) of section 37, determined the claim in favour of the gas board on July 6, 1950.

The corporation continued in its refusal to pay the amounts claimed, and the gas board thereupon began proceedings claiming the total of the two amounts, namely, £10,631 3s. and interest thereon from the date of the Minister's determination. The corporation by their defence contended that any debit or credit entries under the heading of gas undertaking in their accounts were made in constituent parts of one account, namely, the corporation's general rate fund, and that under the provisions of a special Act, the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926,[2] and section any revenue out of the corporation's gas undertaking and crediting them to the other accounts as alleged. It was contended, therefore, that since the subject-matter of the claim had become part of the general rate fund, it was not a subject-matter to which section 37 (1) of the Gas Act, 1948, applied, and in consequence the determination by the Minister under subsection (2) was not binding on the corporation.

HALLETT J. This action raises a question which may be of some importance. The Gas Act, 1948, was passed for the purpose of compulsorily acquiring the gas undertakings of the country, whether owned by private companies or by local authorities, and vesting them in certain gas boards, of which the plaintiffs are one. The vesting date was ultimately fixed as May 1, 1949. The Act had its first reading on January 23, 1948, and that is no doubt the reason why that date appears in section 36 of the Act. When the Act was first introduced it did not contain section 37, but on the second reading on February 10, 1948, the Minister intimated that he intended to introduce into the Act certain further provisions with respect to the transfer of assets before the vesting date, and no doubt that was the reason why the date, February 10, 1948, ultimately appeared in section 37, though I am told that the section was not moved into the Bill until May 12, 1948.

It is reasonably clear that, if the new area gas boards were going to be possessed on the vesting date of the assets of the former gas undertakings, those who were interested in the former gas undertakings might seek before the vesting date to put some of their assets out of the reach of the gas boards. One can conceive that that would be the more likely in the case of local authorities, because whereas companies owning gas undertakings were to receive compensation, local authorities were to have no compensation for losing what, in many cases, might have been very valuable assets, except that there was a lump sum made available for compensation in respect of severance. That danger —that, before the assets vested under section 37, some of them might have been put out of the reach of the gas boards—was appreciated by Parliament, and there are a few sections in the Act which are under the heading "Control of dividends and interest and safeguarding of assets pending transfer." The heading has no statutory authority, as I understand, but it does usefully summarize the objects obviously sought to be attained by sections 33 to 38 of the Act. I need not read section 37, but it is to be observed that it has two subsections, and there arise therefore in this action two points to be determined. The first subsection lays down that in certain events the local authority, in this case the defendants, shall be liable to pay certain amounts to the appropriate board, in this case the plaintiffs, with an exception which both parties are agreed has no materiality for the purposes of the present case. Sir Frank's first point was that on a true construction of section 37 (1) of the Gas Act, 1948, and on the true view of the facts here, there had arisen on the part of the defendants a liability to pay to the appropriate board the two sums claimed in this action.

But there is another subsection, which reads as follows: "Any claim under this section by the appropriate board against the local authority shall be made before the expiration of a period of 12 months beginning with the vesting date, and if so made and not settled by agreement, shall be determined by the Minister of Health." Sir Frank's second point was that, whether the claim was or was not a valid claim under the provisions of the first subsection having regard to the facts of this case, the validity of the claim was by the second subsection expressly referred by the legislature to the Minister of Health for determination; and accordingly, on well known principles, and in the light of abundant authority, this court had no jurisdiction to decide whether the claim was or was not a valid claim, because, the validity of the claim being referred by statute to the Minister of Health, it had in fact been considered by the Minister of Health, who had determined it adversely to the defendants.

I do not think that the law on the subject is in any doubt. I may, perhaps, first refer to a very old case of Crisp v. Bunbury,[11] which was referred to with approval in Joseph Crosfield & Sons Ld. v. Manchester Ship Canal Co.[12] The decision, as I understand it, can be summarized as follows: if two persons agree that any dispute which may arise between them in respect of any matter shall be referred to the determination of a third person, then such an agreement will not oust the jurisdiction of the court; but since the court attaches importance to the sanctity of contract, the court will, generally speaking, in the exercise of its discretion and in aid of that sanctity of contract, stay an action which is brought in contravention of, or on non-compliance with, what has been agreed. That is what happens in the usual case where there is what is commonly called an arbitration clause, and one party, notwithstanding the arbitration clause, seeks to resort to the courts.

On the other hand, where the legislature has thought it proper to lay down that the determination of a certain question should be made by some authority other than the courts, then the courts have no jurisdiction to override what Parliament has so laid down, and they have no jurisdiction to determine that which Parliament has said shall be determined by some other person or body. If the other person or body, being in the nature of an inferior tribunal, proceeds to exceed its authority or not to exercise it properly, then, in certain appropriate cases, the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, acting through the Divisional Court, can restrain the person or body so acting by processes which are well known; but, apart from that authority which can be exercised over inferior tribunals, the court cannot proceed as an appellate authority to review and, if it thinks right, overrule the determination of a person or body to whom Parliament has entrusted the determination of the particular problem.

I think that the logical order in which to consider those two points is the inverse of that in which I have stated them, and to consider first the second point, namely, that whether the claim here made by the plaintiffs is or is not a valid claim, the validity of that claim has in fact been determined in favour of the plaintiffs, in default of agreement, by the Minister of Health, and this court has no jurisdiction to investigate its validity.

I turn back to the subsection. In the first place, it is plain that a claim to the two amounts was made by the plaintiffs, and it is also clear that the claim was made before the expiration of the period of 12 months beginning with the vesting date, May 1, 1949.

[His Lordship stated the facts as to the correspondence between the parties and that they formulated their cases to the Minister, and continued:] There is no doubt, and I so hold, that the claim was made before the expiration of a period of 12 months beginning with the vesting date. It has not been disputed that it was a claim by the appropriate board; and there is no doubt that it was made against the local authority. There is also no doubt that, having been made within the prescribed period, it was not settled by agreement. On the contrary, as I have pointed out, each party put their submissions into writing and those submissions were laid before the Minister of Health. It seems to me, therefore, that the only point which remains as regards the position under subsection (2) of section 37 is whether it is a claim under this section, that is to say, under section 37.

Mr. Capewell has argued the matter with the greatest care, but I am not convinced that the claim which was determined by the Minister of Health was not a claim under section 37. It seems to me that it clearly was a claim under section 37. According to the defendants it was a claim which, having regard to the terms of section 37 and to the facts of this case, ought to have been disallowed, that is, that it was not a valid claim. But that it was a claim under section 37 by the appropriate board against the local authority and made before the expiration of 12 months beginning with the vesting date, and that it was not settled by agreement, is beyond doubt. In those circumstances, it seems plain that it was a claim which fell to be determined by the Minister of Health; and since Parliament has said that this claim shall be determined by the Minister, it is not in my judgment a claim which this court has any jurisdiction to determine. The Minister having determined that it was a good claim, this court has no authority to say that in the opinion of this court it is a bad claim and to give judgment for the defendants accordingly.

If I am right about that, it is an end of this action; but since the question whether it was in fact a valid claim has been fully argued by both counsel, and in case it should be held elsewhere that I am wrong about the first point, I think that I ought also to discuss the other point. First, on the legal position, before the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, there were in existence certain enactments providing for the application of the revenue from the corporation's revenue-producing undertakings—the water undertaking, gas undertaking, light railways undertaking and the electricity undertaking. The enactment which dealt with the application of the revenue of the gas undertaking was an Act of 1904, by section 177 of which the corporation were bound to "apply all money received by them on account of revenue in "respect of their gas undertaking in manner and in the order "following (that is to say)," and there followed certain provisions which I need not read; and the section concluded with these words: "And the corporation shall carry to the borough fund "so much of any balance remaining in any year of the income "of the undertaking (including the interest on the reserve fund ". . .) as may in the opinion of the corporation not be required "for carrying on the undertaking and paying the current expenses "connected therewith." Thus, under section 177 of the Act of 1904 the corporation were under an obligation to carry to the borough fund, which is what would now be called the general rate fund, any balance remaining in any year of the income of the undertaking which was not required by the corporation for carrying on the undertaking and paying the current expenses connected therewith.

By section 79 of the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, the enactments to which I have referred relating to the application of revenue from the revenue-producing undertakings were repealed, including section 177 of the Act of 1904, and thereafter the corporation were left free to deal with the revenue. By section 71 of the Act of 1926 it was laid down that as from a certain date " all money received by the corporation on account " of the revenue of the following undertakings (namely) "—and the section then names six revenue-producing undertakings, of which the third is the gas undertaking—" shall be carried to and " shall form part of the borough fund and all payments and " expenses made and incurred in respect of those undertakings " shall be paid out of that fund."

The Local Government Act, 1933, in section 185 as regards borough councils and in section 188 as regards urban district councils, contains substantially similar provisions. By section 185: " (1) All receipts of the council of a borough . . . shall be " carried to the general rate fund of the borough, and all liabilities " falling to be discharged by the council shall be discharged out " of that fund. (2) An account, called the ' general rate fund " ' account,' shall be kept of all receipts carried to, and payments " made out of, the general rate fund." Section 72 of the Doncaster Corporation Act, 1926, however, provides that separate accounts shall be kept in respect of the undertakings therein mentioned, the light railways undertaking, the water undertaking, the gas undertaking, the electricity undertaking, the market undertaking and the baths undertaking, and it lays down what those accounts shall contain. The object of such separate accounts being kept is fairly apparent, and was summarized by Lord Greene M.R. in Allchin v. Coulthard,[13] and has also been considered by Wynn-Parry J. in North-Eastern Gas Board v. Leeds Corporation,[14] where he quoted the passage from Lord Greene's judgment.

Section 73 of the Act of 1926 is concerned with the disposal of surplus revenue of the electricity undertaking in reduction of electricity charges, but, apart from that, there is no provision limiting the way in which the corporation may deal with the revenue from their revenue-producing undertakings. Separate accounts of those undertakings had to be kept, even apart from section 72 of the Doncaster Corporation Act of 1926, in order to satisfy other obligations of the corporation. For instance, as regards gas, accounts had to be furnished by the corporation to the Board of Trade as to undertakings under the Gas Regulation Act, 1920, s. 15 (1); and as regards the light railways undertaking accounts had to be furnished to the Minister of Transport under section 78 of the Doncaster Corporation Act of 1926; and, as I have already pointed out, under section 73 of the Corporation Act of 1926 it still is necessary that they should have separate accounts of the electricity undertaking. That, then, is the position as to their obligation to keep separate accounts.

I now turn to what they in fact did. They did keep separate accounts of their various revenue-producing undertakings and also of other departments of their activities. The abstract of the treasurer's account for the year ended March 31, 1948, is before me. The table of contents starts with "Gas works "account," and goes on with "water works account," "elec- "tricity account," and so forth. The first section of the book is described as "General rate fund (gas works section)." Then there is the revenue account and certain other accounts for the gas works undertaking. I think myself that that heading, "General rate fund (gas works section)," is used because of the provisions of section 71 of the Corporation Act, and it would indeed in any case probably have been necessary because of the provisions of section 185 of the Local Government Act, 1933; but however that may be, there is no doubt whatever that there is in this volume a separate section for the accounts of the gas works undertaking and, indeed, it appears that that section of the volume was originally in fact physically separate for the purpose of its submission to the appropriate committee of the corporation for approval. So all through this volume there are these different sections for different undertakings, some of them revenue-producing and some not revenue-producing; and finally there is the aggregate balance sheet as at March 31, 1948. On the liabilities side of the account, and on the property, assets and outlay side, the heading in the left-hand column is "Account "or Fund. Gas, water, electricity, trackless trolley," and so forth.

To my mind it is quite unarguable that there was not a separate gas account and also a separate general rate account. Mr. Capewell urged very strongly, and with the authority behind him of the first of the two cases I mentioned in this connexion, Allchin v. Coulthard,[15] that there was only one fund, apart possibly from the reserve fund, as to which I think he would concede that there was a special position; but apart from the reserve fund, he submitted, on the strength of section 71 of the special Act, as he would have submitted on the strength of section 185 of the general Act, that there was only one fund, namely, the general rate fund; and I will assume, without deciding it, that in that submission he was correct. But whether there be only one fund or not, I am abundantly satisfied on the evidence here that there was more than one account, and in particular that there was a gas account, a water works account, and the other account, the general rate account.

I have referred so far to the abstract of accounts for 1948, but the corporation, of course, have disclosed also their books of account, and there was, among other books, a gas section ledger and a gas section cash book; there was a water works ledger and a water works cash book, and there was a general rate fund ledger and a general rate fund cash book. Extracts of the relevant entries from those books have been made and were put before me.

I must consider now what actually happened with regard to the amounts with which I am concerned. In the first place, in the gas account for the year ending March 31, 1948, the net revenue account, there is shown a balance, being a net profit of £8,487 2s. 9d. The question then arises: what happened to that net profit of the gas undertaking? There is no doubt as to what happened to it, because the gas ledger shows that that net profit for the year was transferred to the general rate fund as shown by a cash book entry; and, having been transferred to the general rate fund, it is agreed that it forms part of the figure of £79,099 2s. 0d.—trading surpluses account—in the general rate fund summary revenue account, as a contribution in aid of rates. The same thing appears also from the ledger and cash book entries relating to the gas undertaking and to the general rate fund. In other words, it is plain that the £8,487 2s. 9d. was debited, as one of the witnesses for the defendants agreed, in the gas account, and the same amount, though concealed in a larger amount, was credited in the general rate fund revenue account.

The other item in dispute is somewhat more difficult to deal with, although I have come to the conclusion that there is no difference in principle which affects the matter. It appears that at some time before 1946 the corporation had been compelled to pay excess profits tax in respect of their revenue-producing undertakings. That liability to excess profits tax only arose in respect of revenue-producing undertakings and, therefore, the revenue-producing undertakings furnished the money necessary for the purpose of paying it. At the time with which I am concerned there had become payable a refund of excess profits tax. As I understand it, it seems to be agreed that the undertakings of the corporation, both for the purpose of the payment of excess profits tax and also for the purpose of a refund when a refund becomes due, are considered together. Under the provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, ss. 39 and 40, no post-war refund was to be made to any person unless undertakings and authorities were given in connexion with the use of the net amount of the refund for the purposes of a specified trade or business; and the undertaking in substance which had to be given was that the net amount of the refund would be used in developing or re-equipping the trade or business and, until so used, would be so dealt with as to remain available for use, when required, in developing or re-equipping the trade or business.

The corporation received two amounts by way of a refund of excess profits tax. The first amount was an actual cash payment. The second amount was recovered by way of deduction from a liability of the corporation to the inland revenue authorities, and it is because of those two different ways in which the refund was received that the facts have been a little complicated by the splitting up of the amount claimed by the plaintiffs under the second head into two items, the first being £1,012 4s. 5d., and the second £1,131 15s. 10d. The corporation having received back the two sums, those refunds were apportioned by the borough treasurer among the revenue-producing undertakings in the accounts of those undertakings. The borough treasurer took the view that he was bound to apportion those refunds by virtue of section 75 of the Doncaster Corporation Act of 1926, and, as at present advised, I am disposed to agree with him. But he further told me (and I need hardly say that the only two witnesses called were both as candid and as helpful as one would have expected) that even if he had not been compelled to do it, as he thought he was by section 75 of the Act, he would have done it anyhow as the right thing to do. On the other hand, Mr. Hill, who was called before me as a financial expert, took the view that it was a wrong thing to do. As I said during the course of the hearing, I am not going to decide which is the correct method of accountancy as between those two experts. It is sufficient for my purpose to say that, as is plain and admitted in fact, £2,144 0s. 3d. was apportioned to the gas account and appears in the accounts of the gas section under the heading "E.P.T. post-war refund suspense account." There seem to be obvious reasons why it should be put to suspense, because under the section of the Finance Act it had either to be spent on development, etc., or had to be kept available for that purpose; and I imagine that the normal way of keeping a sum available for a purpose in the future is to put it into a suspense account. Anyhow, the total was put into a suspense account.

Having been put into a suspense account, what happened to it? The ledger of the gas undertaking shows us. On March 31, that account was debited with £2,144 0s. 3d. in respect of a cash transfer to water revenue. One can trace it out at the other end, because when one looks in the water works ledger and also, of course, in the water works cash book, one sees: "To "various accounts excess profits tax, post-war refunds, gas, £2,144 0s. 3d." So there is a debit in the gas account of that sum in respect of a transfer to water revenue, and a credit in the water account in respect of that sum received from gas, just as there is a credit there of a certain sum received in respect of trackless trolley, and so forth. In the abstract it is perhaps a little more difficult to follow, but there is no doubt now as to the facts.

Those being the facts, I come back to section 37. Before I do so, I should say that while counsel on both sides have done their best to give me assistance by way of authority, I have not found any case which really assists me directly in the present instance. Perhaps I should refer to two cases. The latest is North-Eastern Gas Board v. Leeds Corporation,[16] a decision of Wynn-Parry J. in May of this year. In that case the transfer or the dealing on the part of the local authority with the sums there in question had taken place long before February 10, 1948. As I understand it, the corporation there transferred the sums in question to their general rate fund in 1947. Accordingly, section 37 of the Gas Act, 1948, had no relevance; but what the Gas Board there had to demonstrate was, to quote the words of Wynn-Parry J.,[17] " that the corporation had no power to perform these " operations "—that is, the transfers—" at the time when they " did so "; and, for reasons which were set forth in his judgment, he came to the conclusion that in 1947 they had power to perform the operations which they did perform and that, the moneys having as a result of those operations been merged in the general rate fund—" lost " was the word, I think, used by Lord Greene in the earlier case [18]—the gas board could not disentangle them and claim them as assets of the gas undertaking which vested by reason of the vesting sections of the Act of 1948. If I have rightly summarized the substance of that case, it clearly is of no help to me here. I assume here, without deciding it, as I think I have already said, that but for the passing of the Gas Act, 1948, and in particular but for the results of section 37, the corporation could have merged the two amounts now in question in the general rate fund and, if it was desired, and as they actually did, could have merged one of them in the general rate fund and the other in the accounts of the water undertaking. But that is not the question I have to decide. I have to decide what is the effect on the liability of the defendants of section 37 of the Act.

The other case to which Mr. Capewell referred was Allchin v. Coulthard.[19] That was in respect of an income tax question, and affords support for what Mr. Hill told me as to the use which is usually made by corporations of what I understand are called among corporation financial experts the " Chesterfield Clauses "; but again, I can find no help in that case on the problem with which I am concerned. What I must do is to take the words of the section and see if there is any doubt as to their meaning or as to their application to the present facts.

The opening words of section 37 are: " Where at any time " after the tenth day of February, 1948,"—there has been no dispute here that what the defendants did with regard to the two sums in question was done after February 10, 1948—" a local " authority have, without the approval of the Minister of Health," —again there is no dispute that whatever the local authority, the defendants, did was done without the approval of the Minister of Health—" debited any amount in the accounts of the gas " undertaking of the authority . . ." I ask myself first: have the local authority debited the first of the two sums in question in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the authority? One does not like to say anything that is obvious, especially when Mr.

EAST MIDLANDS GAS BOARD v. DONCASTER CORPORATION.

Hallett J.

Capewell has argued so clearly the contrary; but apart from that, I would have said it was obvious on the materials before me—the extracts and books of the corporation—that they did debit the first of the amounts in question in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the authority. It appears to be equally clear that they did debit the second of the amounts in question in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the authority. Here is the gas ledger, the account of the gas undertaking. Here are two debits both on March 31, 1948, one in respect of a cash transfer to the general rate fund and the other in respect of a cash transfer to the water revenue. Using the English language in the ordinary sense, I cannot see how there could be a clearer debiting of the two amounts in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the authority.

The section continues: where a local authority have "debited "any amount in the accounts of the gas undertaking of the "authority and credited that amount in any other account of "the authority"—here, again, it seems to me perfectly plain. Have this local authority, the defendants, credited the £8,487 2s. 9d. debited in the account of the gas undertaking in any other account of the authority? The answer is that all the entries show that they have. They credited it in what they call here the general rate fund account of the authority. How there could be a clearer crediting in another account of the authority I cannot imagine. Then as regards the second amount in dispute, £2,144, as I have said, there was clearly a debiting in the account of the gas undertaking, and it seems to me there was equally a clear crediting in another account of the authority, namely, the water works account. Whether you look at the ledger or at the cash book, described as the water works cash book, or the water section ledger, you see there clearly credited the very sum with the word "gas" against it which you see debited in the account of the gas undertaking. In this event, the section goes on, "the local authority shall be liable to pay that amount "to the appropriate board," with an exception which, as I have said, is immaterial.

If one looks at the words of the section, it seems plain that in upholding the claim of the plaintiffs in the present case the Minister of Health was correct. It is idle to discuss what might have been the result if the words of the section had been different from what they are. I have to decide this case on what Parliament has chosen to say. Parliament chose to use what appears to me to be very plain language, and the facts of this case seem without any doubt to fall within the scope of that very plain language.

For those reasons, I think that the plaintiffs in this case should succeed on both grounds. First, I think that they must succeed because there has been a determination by the Minister of Health in their favour on their disputed claim, and a determination of such dispute has by statute been left to the Minister of Health and this court has no right to differ from his decision, or, indeed to review it; and, secondly, because in my judgment, even if, contrary to the view which I take, it were open to me to review the decision of the Minister of Health, I have no doubt that his determination was in fact correct.

For those reasons there will be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

Factory—Definition—Directors' restaurant—Premises within the curtilage of a factory—User—Not a "factory"—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 151 (1), (6).

A factory contained within its curtilage a canteen called the Vicarage Restaurant, for the exclusive use of administrative and executive staff. One of the three dining rooms in the restaurant building was occasionally used as a conference room where representatives of the shop stewards and the management met; and there was also in the building a games room reserved for the use of apprentices. A general handyman employed by the owners fell from a ladder while cleaning one of the windows of the Vicarage Restaurant, and he claimed damages for personal injuries which he alleged were due (inter alia) to a breach by his employers of their statutory duty under section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937.

Held, applying the tests laid down by MacKinnon L.J. in Wood v. London County Council [1941] 2 K.B. 232 (57 T.L.R. 499) ([1941] 2 All E.R. 230) and by the Divisional Court in London Co-operative Society Co. v. Southern Essex Assessment Committee [1942] 1 K.B. 53 ([1941] 3 All E.R. 252), that looking at the Vicarage Restaurant as a complete whole and at the purposes for which it was used, and considering whether it was essential for the welfare of the admittedly industrial workers of the factory, the Vicarage Restaurant was not within the definition of a factory in section 151 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, for although it was within the curtilage of a factory it was, within the meaning of subsection (6) of section 151, used for some purpose other than the process carried on in the factory.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, aged 69 years, had been employed by the defendants, manufacturers of electrical equipment and appliances who had a large factory at Neasden, Middlesex, for 17 years, originally as a storeman and since 1947 as a handyman in connexion with a directors' canteen at the factory known as the Vicarage Restaurant. On March 12, 1951, the plaintiff was cleaning one of the windows of the restaurant, for which purpose he was using an extension ladder, when he slipped and fell to the ground, sustaining concussion and other injuries.

He claimed damages for personal injuries alleging that by reason of the negligence and breach of statutory duty under section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] the ladder moved causing him to fall, or alternatively (by amendment), that if the ladder was in the position alleged by the defence where it could not move, then in that position it was too short. The defendants (inter alia) denied that the Vicarage Restaurant was a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, and the case is reported only on that point.

H. S. Ruttle for the plaintiff.

Montague Berryman Q.C. and M. J. Anwyl-Davies for the defendants.

HAVERS J., after considering the evidence and the facts relating to the alleged negligence at common law, continued:— One question of considerable difficulty has arisen with regard to the question of statutory duty, namely, whether or not these premises (I am referring to the Vicarage Restaurant) were a factory within the meaning of section 151 of the Factories Act, 1937. I will consider first of all the facts before I come to the law. The defendants own and conduct a very extensive factory in which they manufacture and assemble various electrical equipment and parts. Before 1938 the property which is now known as the Vicarage Restaurant did not belong to the defendants, but in that year they purchased it. The Vicarage Restaurant previously had been walled off from the defendants' factory, but after 1938, when this was acquired, what had been the bowling green of the vicarage was excavated to make way for the erection of a new building which is now known as No. 55, and there is a projecting part of that building which, at the time of the accident, the ground then being excavated, was fenced off. Since the defendants have acquired this extra piece of ground and built this new building, the original wall of the vicarage has been pulled down and a new entrance has been made to the Vicarage Restaurant. But it is clearly now, as I think, within the curtilage of the factory proper, if I may use that expression to describe what was the factory before the purchase of those new premises.

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 26: "(1) There shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, be provided and maintained safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work. (2) Where any person is to work at a place from which he will be liable to fall a distance more than ten feet, then, unless the place is one which affords secure foothold and, where necessary, secure hand-hold, means shall be provided, so far as is reasonably practicable, by fencing or otherwise for ensuring his safety."

A considerable amount of evidence has been called as to the user of this Vicarage Restaurant, and a plan has been put in from which it appears what was the nature of the accommodation provided. (I need not trouble about the attic, which I was told was only used for storing junk). On the first floor there was a flat, which was used by the caretaker, which consisted of a kitchen, bedroom, and dining room. There was a dining room which was used by the women supervisors employed by the defendants, and there was also a restaurant, manageress's office and store. On the ground floor there were three dining rooms, dining room No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3. No. 1 dining room was used by the higher executive staff, No. 2 dining room by the senior staff, and No. 3 by the sales staff, who were all either executive or administrative persons. The factory itself employed some 2,500 workers, and it will be observed that there were canteens strictly within the factory premises themselves which were used for the purposes of the workmen who engaged in the industrial part of the business. One significant piece of evidence was that though ordinary people employed in the industrial part of the factory might occasionally have to go to the Vicarage Restaurant, they would only be entitled to do so if they went on the instructions or directions of somebody in order to carry out some duty in the restaurant. They would not be permitted to enter the Vicarage Restaurant for any other purpose; they had canteens of their own in a different part of the factory.

The plaintiff said that there were a number of foremen who were entitled to use, and did use, this Vicarage Restaurant for the purposes of lunch—I ought to say that these three dining rooms were chiefly used for lunches, and occasionally for teas, by the persons of the category which I have described, and by executives of the company. In addition, there were certain other people who were entitled to use the dining room, but with one exception, a Mr. Wright, they were all persons who, I think, came under the description of administrative heads. Mr. Wright was a foreman of the tool room; he was a shop foreman, but his position was a special one. He was a very old hand of the company's, and he had made application to the company to be allowed to use the Vicarage Restaurant and they had made a concession to him by way of indulgence as a result of his long service with the company. Otherwise, as I find, there were no shop foremen who used the Vicarage Restaurant or were entitled to use it. I was told that some 90 lunches were served each day, but there were also some additional lunches served to guests, and there were usually some guests every day.

Apart from those dining rooms on the ground floor there was a games room, which was reserved for apprentices, not for the purpose of eating meals there but as a games room. As is usual in a large company like this where there are apprentices, there were apprentices who were engaged in learning the various duties of the various departments of which this factory was composed—engineering, draughtsmanship, manufacturing, and so on—but they were all trained in order to obtain the necessary knowledge and experience to take up some post at the end of their training. It is quite true, as Mr. Ruttle said, that some of them were engaged in the ordinary industrial side of the work where they were learning and gaining experience. They were paid for that and assisted, of course, in the production of the articles manufactured by the company.

THOMAS v. BRITISH THOMSON-HOUSTON CO. LD.

There was one other feature of the user which makes this case a little more difficult to decide than otherwise it would have been, and that is that one of those dining rooms was used occasionally, either once every three months or sometimes once every month, as a conference room in which the representatives of the shop stewards and representatives of the management met to discuss matters of mutual interest between them. Those matters might include wages, welfare, or conditions of service. As I have said, so far as the women on the upper floor were concerned, they were all administrative members of the staff, senior secretaries and so on.

That is the nature of the premises and its user. I have now to consider whether it comes within the definition of a factory in section 151 of the Factories Act, 1937. Of course, this Vicarage Restaurant in its dictionary sense is obviously not a factory nor is it, if one uses the ordinary language as a description, a factory or anything like it. But that does not end the matter, because one has to see whether or not it comes within the definition in section 151 of the Factories Act, which provides: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the expression "'factory' means any premises in which, or within the close "or curtilage or precincts of which, persons are employed in "manual labour in any process for or incidental to any of the "following purposes, namely:—(a) the making of any article "or of part of any article; or (b) the altering, repairing, "ornamenting, finishing, cleaning, or washing, or the breaking "up or demolition of any article; or (c) the adapting for sale of "any article; being premises in which, or within the close or "curtilage or precincts of which, the work is carried on by way "of trade or for purposes of gain and to or over which the "employer of the persons employed therein has the right of access "or control." Then subsection (6) provides: "Where a place "situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory "is solely used for some purpose other than the processes "carried on in the factory, that place shall not be deemed to "form part of the factory for the purposes of this Act, but shall, "if otherwise it would be a factory, be deemed to be a separate "factory." I think there is no doubt that the Vicarage Restaurant comes within the first part of section 151. I think it is within the close, curtilage, or precincts and, therefore, prima facie is a factory.

I have now to consider whether the first part of subsection (6) takes it out of that category. The question, for me to decide, therefore, is: is it solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory? On that question I have had a number of authorities cited to me. The first case was Cardiff Revenue Officer v. Cardiff Assessment Committee,[2] a decision of the Divisional Court, consisting of Avory and Talbot JJ. That was a question of a rating under the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. The headnote reads: "Printing offices and works "in which a newspaper was composed, printed, and published, "were included in the Special List under the Rating and Valua- "tion (Apportionment) Act, 1928, as an industrial hereditament, "and an apportionment was made of the net annual value of the "hereditament according as its various parts were used for "industrial or non-industrial purposes." The second part of the finding was, "that the annual value of the hereditament must "be apportioned according to the occupation and use thereof for "industrial purposes, and the occupation and use for other "purposes; that those portions of the premises which were "occupied and used for printing, composing, engraving, pub- "lishing and circulating were used for industrial purposes and "entitled to be derated, but that those portions of the premises "which were occupied and used for the editorial department, "general administrative offices and clerical staff, advertising "department, stationery counter, and returns store were used "for non-industrial purposes and not entitled to be derated."

Avory J. said[3]: "My opinion is that in each of these cases "the items which are included under the head of 'Printing, com- "'posing, engraving, etc.,' are all clearly used for industrial "purposes, with the exception in the Western Mail case of the "item of 270 sq. feet which is described as a 'canteen,' and in "the David Duncan case with the exception of the item of 1,152 "sq. feet which is described as 'mess-room and cook-house.'" Talbot J. said[4]: "I do not wish to add anything to what "has been already said about the details of the apportionment, "but I would add one thing with the consent of my brother "Avory. I think that what he said with regard to the mess-room "and cook-house in the case of David Duncan & Sons may not "have been wholly unambiguous. I have his authority for "saying this, and it is also my own view; I do not think that "he intended to say that the mess-room and cook-house neces- "sarily came out of the industrial part of the building. Whether "they do or not must depend upon the persons for whose accom- "modation they are provided and used: according to whether "they relate to the industrial part, the factory proper, if I may " use the term, or to the clerical and editorial part of the " hereditament."

That case was followed in 1941 by London Co-operative Society Ltd. v. Southern Essex Assessment Committee.[5] There the headnote reads: " A laundry conducted by a co-operative society " included a canteen which was used solely for supplying refresh- " ments to the workers in the laundry which was admittedly an " industrial hereditament within section 3 (1) of the Rating and " Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. All the food supplied " in the canteen had to be purchased, and all purchases ranked " for the usual dividends paid in respect of purchases made at the " co-operative society's retail shops:—Held, that the canteen was " not a place which was ' solely used for some purpose other " ' than the manufacturing process or handicraft, carried on in ' " the laundry within section 149 (4) of the Factory and Workshop " Act, 1901, and, therefore, that it was entitled to be derated as " being part of the industrial hereditament. Per Tucker J.: " The decisive element is that the canteen was essential for the " welfare and efficiency of the workers engaged in the admittedly " industrial part of the undertaking." That was the criterion which Tucker J. applied. He said[6]: " The difficulty which " I have felt is whether this is not a pure question of fact with " regard to which it is difficult to say that quarter sessions have " come to a wrong conclusion, but on the whole I agree that, " on the facts as set out, a question of law is raised and quarter " sessions came to an erroneous decision on it. The element " which, to my mind, is decisive is that the facts stated show that " the canteen was necessary and essential for the welfare and " efficiency of the workers engaged in the admittedly industrial " part of the undertaking. It is true that the words in the case " are that the appellants consider the canteen necessary for the " welfare of the workers and that quarter sessions have not " expressly said that they consider it essential, but to say on that " account that they have not so found is to take too narrow a view " of their finding. Having regard to the whole of the facts as set " out, I think it is apparent that in this particular case this " canteen was an essential and necessary part of the factory."

My attention was also called to Street v. British Electricity Authority[7] on rather a different point; I do not think that I need refer to that case. There was another case to which Mr. Berryman attached great importance, Wood v. London County Council.[8] That was a case where it was a kitchen in a hospital, and the headnote reads: " While the plaintiff, a kitchen-maid " employed by the defendants, a public authority, was mincing " meat with an electrically operated mincing machine in the " kitchen of a hospital belonging to the defendants, the minced

" meat being intended for consumption on the premises by the " patients at and/or the staff of the hospital, her hand was " caught in the machine and she was injured:—Held, that the " kitchen was not ' a factory ' within section 151 (1) (a) and (b) " and (9) of the Factories Act, 1937, and, therefore, that the " defendants were under no obligation under section 14 of the " Act to fence securely any dangerous machinery therein," and the decision of Tucker J. was reversed on that point. Tucker J. had held that persons were employed in " ' manual labour in any " ' process for or incidental to . . . (a) the making of any article " ' [i.e., mince] . . . or (b) the altering . . . of any article [i.e., " ' corned beef],' " and was, therefore, a " ' factory.' ". It seems to me that, generally speaking, the ordinary work in a kitchen does necessarily involve some alteration of the article. Potatoes, meat, fruit, and things like that, in their raw state, come out in their cooked state and there must necessarily be, therefore, some sort of alteration in the article. And if you have a restaurant there is always, I think, an adaptation for sale and, of course, there is also a necessary amount of washing-up machines, and so on. But, notwithstanding that, the Court of Appeal held that in the facts of that case that kitchen was not a factory.

MacKinnon L.J. said [9]: " It is contended that this kitchen " was a ' factory ' within the definition in section 151 (1) " of the Factories Act, 1937. The sidenote to that section is: " ' Interpretation of expression " Factory." ' [His lordship " read the material part of subsections (1) and (9).] It is said " that the plaintiff was employed in manual labour and that is " true. Next, it is said that she was employed in manual labour " in a process for or incidental to one of the purposes mentioned " in section 151 (1) (b), and I think the principal thing relied on " is ' the breaking up or demolition of any article.' It was also " said that the subsequent words of subsection (1) about the need " of the work being carried on for purposes of trade or gain were " rendered inapplicable because these premises were in the " occupation of the London County Council, and, therefore, " within section 151 (9)." His lordship went on to consider a number of other matters, and he pointed out, if that was a factory, the great difficulty that there would be and the apparent inapplicability of a number of the sections of the Factories Act to a kitchen of that type which was in a hospital, and in particular he said: " I may point out that by section 70, which is " under the headings ' Hours and holidays ' and ' Employment " ' of women and young persons,' it is provided that the period " of employment shall not exceed 11 hours in any day, and " shall not begin earlier than seven o'clock in the morning, nor " end later than six o'clock in the evening, or, on Saturday, " one o'clock in the afternoon. Those are provisions which I " should think it would be quite impossible to apply to the work

[9] [1941] 2 K.B. 232, 235, 236, 237.

THOMAS v. BRITISH THOMSON-HOUSTON CO. LD.

HAVERS J.

"being carried on in the kitchen of this asylum, in particular "the provision that no work shall be done earlier than 7 a.m. "or after 6 p.m."

Then he went on to say: "Those are some of the extra- "ordinary results which follow if this kitchen is a 'factory,' "quite apart from one's surprise, from the point of view of "common sense, that an ordinary kitchen (although, no doubt, "a kitchen on a very considerable scale, because there are over "two thousand people to cook for) could be within the definition "of a factory at all. Mr. Paull was quite consistent in his "argument, because he did not shrink from agreeing to my "suggestion that, if this was a little cottage hospital, conducted "by some rural district council with perhaps two people in its "small kitchen, those premises would be a 'factory' for there "would be persons employed in manual labour in a process "incidental to one of the following purposes, namely, the "washing of an article, that is to say, the ordinary washing up "of the few plates and dishes used in the hospital. I fully "recognize that, in construing an Act, one is not to be deflected "from giving it its proper meaning by looking at the absurd "lengths to which the definition may drive one, but I do not "think it is improper to take into account the whole nature of "these premises and the nature of the work that is going on in "them. In my view, a kitchen is not within this definition of "a 'factory' because dishes are washed up in it or because "articles are altered, finished or cleaned in it, or because articles "are ornamented, as, for instance, by providing icing sugar on a "cake or parsley as a garniture for dishes. A kitchen which is "carried on in a large way by people running a restaurant by "way of trade or for purposes of gain would not, by reason of "those words, become a factory within that section." I have to take into account the whole nature of this Vicarage Restaurant and the nature of the work going on in it.

Then, the other way, Mr. Ruttle relied on Simmonds Aerocessories (Western) Ld. v. Pontypridd Area Assessment Committee and Another.[10] That was a decision of the Divisional Court, and there the question was whether a canteen which was restricted to the use of the appellants' employees and which comprised two large dining rooms in which hot and cold meals were served, cloak rooms, and other accommodation, "was a factory within "the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901." There was electrical machinery used in the kitchen of the canteen. The judgment of the court (Viscount Caldecote C.J., Macnaghten and Atkinson JJ.) was read by Atkinson J., who stated the facts, and continued: "Subject to certain exceptions "specified in section 3 (1) of the Rating and Valuation (Appor- "tionment) Act, 1928, an 'industrial hereditament' means a "hereditament used and occupied as a factory or workshop,

"these expressions having the same meaning as in the Factory "and Workshop Acts, 1901–1920. The first question, therefore, "is whether this canteen is a factory or workshop. Both expres- "sions include (inter alia) any premises wherein manual labour "is exercised by way of trade, or for purposes of sale for gain, "in or incidental to any of certain purposes, including the making "of any article or the adapting for sale of any article. It is "plain that much manual labour is exercised in the canteen for "the purpose of making articles of food and for the purpose of "adapting articles of food for sale, and that such labour is "exercised by way of trade. The canteen is, therefore, a factory "or workshop." It does not appear, I was told, and I have not been able to see it myself, that Wood v. London County Council [11] was cited in that case.

Then in Stanger v. Hendon Borough Council [12] there is a reference in the course of Somervell L.J.'s judgment to Wood v. London County Council.[13] Somervell L.J. said,[14] after considering the ratio decidendi in Nash v. Hollinshead [15]: "That process of "reasoning was employed in the case of Wood v. London County "Council [16] by MacKinnon L.J. The question there was whether "a kitchen was a factory. A kitchen is no doubt a place in "which things are made and altered. MacKinnon L.J. based "his decision on a consideration of the Acts as a whole. He "said, for instance, if this is a factory, no woman or young "person can be employed later than six o'clock in the evening, "and no woman can be employed on Sunday. This and other "provisions, in his opinion, made it quite clear that kitchens "were outside the Factories Act. That being so, there does not "seem to me any case or principle laid down which is in itself "in favour of Mr. Capewell's argument."

Mr. Ruttle cited one other case to me, Thurogood v. Van Den Berghs & Jurgens Ltd.[17] The headnote in that case reads: "A "factory used for the manufacture of margarine contained "within its curtilage a separate building in which maintenance "work in connexion with the main part of the factory was "carried out. An electrician employed by the owners was "engaged in that maintenance building in testing an electric fan "which normally worked in a ventilator in one of the rooms in "the factory where one of the processes in the manufacture of "margarine was carried on." Devlin J. dismissed the action, holding that the maintenance building was a separate factory, and the Court of Appeal reversed that, holding that it was not a separate factory but was a part of the factory. My attention was called to the judgment of Cohen L.J. where he said [18]: "It

THOMAS v. BRITISH THOMSON-HOUSTON CO. LD.

Havers J.

" is not disputed that the defendants' margarine factory is a " factory within the first part of that definition; but the defen- " dants contend, first, that the separate building in which repairs " to machinery are carried out (I shall refer to it henceforth as " the ' engineering shop ') is to be deemed to be a separate " factory by reason of section 151 (6)." Then he dealt with the process by which the judge arrived at his conclusion[19]: " Devlin J. " recognized that, if the case cited had been a decision under " the Factories Act, it would have been almost conclusive in " favour of the plaintiff in the present case. But he said ' it is " ' a decision under a rating Act, and I do not think, paradoxical " ' though it may sound, that a definition section which is " ' common to two Acts is necessarily to be given the same " ' meaning in both. The way in which sections taken from an " ' earlier Act should be construed in the later Act has been the " ' subject of varying judicial comment.' He then proceeded to " consider a number of authorities, and came to the conclusion " that he had a free hand. In none of the cases which he cited, " however, were any words so definite as ' shall have the same " ' meaning ' used." I do not think that I need deal with the passage which considered the question of construction on the principle that this Act imposes penalties.

On the authority of that case Mr. Ruttle contended that the question which I have to consider is: was this Vicarage Restaurant solely used for some purpose for or incidental to the process carried on in the factory? I think that this is very much a borderline case. The main difficulty arises from two elements in the case, namely, that the apprentices had a games room there and that one of the dining-rooms was occasionally used for the purposes of these joint conferences. However, applying the test which has been applied, and looking, as I do, at this question as MacKinnon L.J. did, looking at the complete whole and seeing the purposes for which it was used, and also bearing in mind the test of the Divisional Court, whether it was essential for the welfare of the admittedly industrial workers, I have come to the conclusion, though it is a borderline case, that I do not think it is a factory. I hold that it is within the curtilage of the factory and comes within section 151 (1). I think that it is solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory and, therefore, the first part of subsection (6) takes it out of the statutory definition of a factory into which it had been grouped by subsection (1) of section 151 and it is not, in my view, brought back again by the latter part of subsection (6). I have followed the principles which have been enunciated by these cases, particularly Wood v. London County Council,[20] and I have come to the conclusion that it cannot be said that this restaurant is a separate factory. In these circumstances, there is, if I am correct, no statutory duty on the defendants under the Factories Act, 1937, with regard to the plaintiff.

[His lordship then considered the position which would have arisen if he had decided that there was a statutory duty resting on the defendants, and came to the conclusion that even assuming that there was such a duty, the plaintiff had not proved breaches of section 26 of the Act of 1937. His lordship further considered the question of negligence and found that the defendants had not been guilty of any breach of duty at common law. His lordship further said that if he had found in favour of the plaintiff he would have assessed the damages at £901.]

* REGINA v. RUSSELL.

Lord Goddard C.J., Hilbery and Hallett JJ.

Criminal law—Sharepushing—"Reckless making of . . . forecasts"—Whether "recklessness" in statutory context connotes dishonesty—Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1939 (2 & 3 Geo. 6, c. 16), s. 12 (1).

Three defendants, company directors, were prosecuted on charges in connexion with the issue of shares, contrary to the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1939, s. 12 (1). The first two counts alleged dishonest concealment of material facts and the making of statements which each knew to be untrue. Count 3 alleged the inducing of persons to enter into agreements to acquire shares by the "reckless making of a misleading and deceptive forecast." The chief magistrate held that on the charges involving recklessness the prosecution must show circumstances from which a jury could infer that the defendants, in doing what they had done, did not care whether what they said was true or false, and had no honest belief in its truth. He accordingly discharged one of the defendants and committed the others for trial.

Before proceeding to trial with a jury, the trial judge held, on a motion to quash the indictment, that the word "reckless" in section 12 (1) must bear its full meaning and be construed as covering the case where there was a high degree of negligence without dishonesty.

The jury found the two defendants guilty on the first two counts alleging dishonest concealment of material facts, but returned no verdict on the count alleging recklessness.

On appeal against conviction by one of the defendants:—

Per curiam, obiter, agreeing with Donovan J., on a true construction of section 12 (1) the word "reckless" covers a case where there has been a statement, promise or forecast made with a high degree of negligence without dishonesty.

Donovan J. [1952] W.N. 506 affirmed.

REGINA
v.
RUSSELL.

APPEAL against conviction by Donovan J. and a jury, Central Criminal Court.

The appellant, Charles Frederick Russell, formerly director of a company, Specialloid Ld., together with one Bates, also a director of the company, and Colonel Charles Sweeny, a director of an issuing house, Federated Trust, were prosecuted at Bow Street Magistrate's Court on charges of offences in connexion with the issue of shares (including the reckless making of forecasts), under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1939, s. 12 (1).[1]

In his judgment on June 27, 1952, the chief magistrate (Sir Lawrence Dunne) referred extensively to the speech of Lord Herschell in Derry v. Peek,[2] as to the burden of proof of fraud which a plaintiff must discharge to sustain a civil action of deceit, and also to Williams Bros. Direct Supply Stores Ld. v. Cloote.[3] He expressed the view that on the charges in question involving recklessness, the prosecution must show circumstances from which a jury could infer that the defendants in doing what they had done did not care whether what they said was true or false, and had no honest belief in its truth.

He discharged the defendant Charles Sweeny, and committed the defendants Bates and Russell for trial.

Counts 1 and 2 of the indictment respectively alleged against the accused the dishonest concealment of material facts and the making of a statement which each knew to be untrue. Count 3 was as follows: "Statement of Offence. Recklessly attempting "to induce persons to invest money contrary to section 12 (1) of "this Act. Particulars of offence: Bates and Russell, on a day "between April 1, 1945, and November 30, 1945, in the County "of London, in a letter headed 'Joseph Sebag & Company, "'Statistical Department,' dated November, 1945, attempted to "induce persons to enter into agreements for acquiring ordinary "shares in Specialloid Ld. by the reckless making of a forecast "which was misleading and deceptive, namely, that the directors "of Specialloid Ld. anticipate that the profits for the year ended "March 31, 1946, should not be less than those shown in the "auditors' report for the preceding year, namely, £65,349, before "charging income tax."

[1] The Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1939, s. 12, provides: "(1) "Any person who, by any statement, "promise or forecast which he knows "to be misleading, false or deceptive, "or by any dishonest concealment of "material facts, or by the reckless "making of any statement, promise or "forecast which is misleading, false "or deceptive, induces or attempts to "induce another person—(a) to enter "into or offer to enter into—(i) any "agreement for, or with a view to, "acquiring, disposing of, subscribing "for or underwriting securities or "lending or depositing money to or "with any industrial and provident "society or building society, or (ii) "any agreement the purpose or pre-"tended purpose of which is to secure "a profit to any of the parties from "the yield of securities or by refer-"ence to fluctuations in the value of "securities, . . . shall be guilty of an "offence. . . ."

At the trial before Donovan J. on September 22, 1952, the Solicitor-General, opening the case for the prosecution, submitted that count 3 was an alternative to counts 1 and 2, in that it would be possible to convict under count 3 even if each accused were acquitted under counts 1 and 2, though counts 1 and 2 obviously involved an express charge of dishonesty, whereas count 3 did not. A man might make a false, misleading and deceptive forecast through recklessness falling short of dishonesty, and he would be content under count 3 to allege such recklessness, which even though it fell short of dishonesty, was still caught by the words of section 12 (1).

Counsel for each of the defendants contended that in view of the prosecution's avowal that the word "reckless" in the section did not necessarily connote dishonesty, count 3 alleged an offence unknown to the law, and that the whole indictment, including counts 1 and 2, was therefore bad and should be quashed.

DONOVAN J. gave judgment on the motion to quash the indictment on September 23, 1952.[4] He held that count 3 was good, the issue being purely one of the construction of section 12 (1) of the Act of 1939, and in particular the passage "the reckless "making of any statement, promise or forecast which is mis- "leading, false or deceptive. . . ."

His Lordship then referred to passages from the speeches of Lord Bramwell and Lord Herschell in Derry v. Peek,[5] and said that he was not constrained by what was there said to decide that in section 12 (1) the word "reckless" connoted only something dishonest.

Section 12 (1) dealt with three categories of persons who have induced or attempted to induce other persons to invest money. The first was the person who made a statement which he knew to be misleading, false or deceptive; the second the person who dishonestly concealed material facts; and the third the person who recklessly made a statement or forecast which was misleading, false or deceptive. Categories 1 and 2 obviously referred to persons who were dishonest. But after referring to a person who had knowingly made a false statement, or who had dishonestly concealed material facts, the legislature, introducing its third category by the disjunctive "or," changed its language altogether. It did not specify a person who knowingly made a misleading, false or deceptive statement, promise or forecast, or dishonestly made it. It simply specified persons who recklessly made these things.

It would be quite understandable if Parliament, intending to do something about misleading, false and deceptive forecasts, took the view that, as a practical matter, it ought to go a step further than in the case of false statements and dishonest concealment of facts, and, in addition to striking at the dishonest prophet, do something to insure that even the honest ones should take due care to see that their forecasts were not misleading, false and deceptive. If, on the other hand, they were reckless, they should be liable to a penalty. There was nothing in this so repugnant to natural justice that he ought to limit the meaning of words which Parliament had used. It had, after all, given the courts ample latitude in the matter of punishment, enabling them to discriminate properly between moral turpitude and mere recklessness. It was not without interest to observe that Lord Herschell in Derry v. Peek [6] foreshadowed that Parliament might one day provide against negligence which was merely a breach of moral duty. Such weight as attached to that which he had just said was not diminished because this part of section 12 (1) dealt also with statements and promises.

With those considerations in mind, and remembering all that had been urged on behalf of the accused, he could not accede to the argument that the word "reckless" in section 12 (1) should receive a restricted meaning connoting only such recklessness as was dishonest. He thought it must be left to bear its full meaning, and be construed, therefore, as covering also the case where there was a high degree of negligence without dishonesty.

He thus held count 3 of the indictment to be good, and gave judgment for the Crown.

At the conclusion of the 15-day trial, Donovan J. in his summing-up to the jury, directed them as to the law on count 3 and the meaning of "reckless." The jury on October 13, 1952, found the defendants Bates and Russell guilty on the first two counts in the indictment, but did not return a verdict on count 3. Donovan J. sentenced them to 12 months' imprisonment.

The defendant Russell appealed, and the second ground of appeal in the original notice of appeal was that the judge had misdirected the jury as to the law relating to count 3 of the indictment.

F. H. Lawton for the appellant. The second ground of appeal relates to the judge's direction in law, but as the jury have not in fact returned a verdict on that count, all that can be done before this court is to invite the court's attention to that count.

[LORD GODDARD C.J. That is really one of the most important points in this case, except that it does not arise. If we were to give an opinion on it, it would be said to be merely obiter. It was unfortunate that the magistrate did give judgment on it, because if we had given a judgment we would differ from him.]

REGINA v. RUSSELL.

LORD GODDARD C.J., in the course of delivering the judgment of the court:—A certain Colonel Sweeny was originally charged with these defendants, but was dismissed from the case by the chief magistrate on grounds which, if we could go into them in this case we gladly would, because it is obvious the judge took a different view with regard to the law which the chief magistrate had expressed when he discharged Colonel Sweeny; and, as the judge did express a view on the motion to quash the indictment, I see no reason why the court should not say that they agree with the view of the judge on the statute. But no doubt the matter will arise again substantively in the future, and can then be dealt with; it does not arise here because the jury were not called on to deal with whether the statements were made recklessly because they were made fraudulently, and the statute distinguishes between a fraudulent statement and a reckless statement. In substance, Colonel Sweeny obtained the information, he being a director of the company called Federated Trust, who were the underwriters in this matter. The information which was contained in this letter, which was on Joseph Sebag & Co.'s notepaper was compiled by Colonel Sweeny. It was revised, and so forth, by the two defendants, and that was the information on which Federated Trust subscribed, and the information which in fact did go to the public after the shares were placed on the market.

The court has jurisdiction under section 42 of the Trustee Act, 1925, to authorize proper remuneration to be paid to a corporate body which has been appointed by the court to be administrator and trustee of the estate of an intestate.

There is also inherent jurisdiction in the court to authorize such remuneration, whether the appointment has been made by the court or not.

MASTERS, DECD., In re.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Leslie Ninian Masters died on March 9, 1949, intestate, leaving surviving him a widow and three children who were at that time infants. On November 22, 1949, a grant of administration of his estate was made to two administrators, as infants were involved in the beneficial interests; the administrators so appointed being Coutts & Co., a trust corporation (the present applicants), and the widow. No order for the remuneration of the applicants was made at the time of the grant.

The estate was substantial, being sworn at £95,000 gross and £80,000 net. After meeting death duties and costs of administration, there remained £45,500 as the capital value of the estate when this summons was taken out in April, 1951. The question raised was whether, under the provisions of section 42 of the Trustee Act, 1925,[1] or under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, there was jurisdiction now to authorize the applicants to charge proper remuneration for acting as administrators and trustees.

D. H. McMullen for the applicants.

Michael Browne for the widow and eldest son (now of age).

M. O'C. Stranders for the infant sons.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

DANCKWERTS J. It is quite plain, in view of the size of the estate, that it was reasonable in the circumstances to employ the services of a trust corporation, the applicants, as there was a good deal of work to be done in the administration of the estate in the carrying out of the trusts under the Trustee Act, 1925.

The summons raised a number of matters of an administrative kind which have mostly been dealt with in chambers already; but one of them is the question of remuneration of Coutts & Co., acting as administrators and trustees. That has been adjourned into court because of a doubt raised as to the jurisdiction of the court to authorize remuneration to be paid out of the estate to the applicants. It is quite plain there is jurisdiction to authorize such remuneration under section 42 of the Trustee Act, 1925.

[His Lordship read sections 42, 68 (17) and 69 (1) and continued:] Those provisions show quite plainly that the duties of

[1] Trustee Act, 1925, s. 42: "Where "the court appoints a corporation, "other than the Public Trustee, to "be a trustee either solely or jointly "with another person, the court may "authorize the corporation to charge "such remuneration for its services "as trustee as the court may think "fit."

S. 68 (17): "'Trust' does not "include the duties incident to an "estate conveyed by way of mortgage, "but with this exception the expres- "sions 'trust' and 'trustee' extend "to implied and constructive trusts ". . . and to the duties incident to "the office of a personal represen- "tative, and 'trustee,' where the "context admits, includes a personal "representative. . . ."

S. 69 (1): "This Act, except where "otherwise expressly provided, applies "to trusts including, so far as this "Act applies thereto, executorships "and administratorships constituted "or created either before or after the "commencement of this Act."

MASTERS, DECD., In re.

an administrator are included in the duties of a trustee for the purposes of this Act, and that therefore section 42 will apply, as regards the power to award remuneration, to the case of a trust corporation which is appointed to be administrator of an estate.

That view has in fact been adopted in the Probate Division by Langton J. in In the Estate of Young,[2] when the court was appointing the National Bank of Scotland, a trust corporation, to be administrator of two estates; and the judge ordered the grants to issue, directing that the grantees should, in both cases, have power to charge according to their authorized scale.

Apart from the statutory jurisdiction conferred by section 42 of the Trustee Act, 1925, it is also quite plain there is inherent jurisdiction in the court to authorize remuneration of a trustee, whether appointed by the court or not. Authority for that is to be found in In re Freeman's Settlement Trusts[3] and Marshall v. Holloway.[4] The same course was really adopted in In re Macadam,[5] reported on the question of the accountability of the trustee for certain directors' fees; but the report[6] shows that Cohen J. left to be decided the question whether in the circumstances of that case he should authorize the trustee in fact to retain the directors' fees under the inherent jurisdiction of the court, and that course was to my knowledge adopted and the remuneration was in fact authorized.

I also remember a case before Eve J., in which I appeared as counsel, before the passing of the Act of 1925 in which, though I do not remember the exact name of the trust, I do remember that the very same bank, Coutts & Co., trustees of a particular trust estate, were authorized by Eve J. to receive remuneration.

There is, in my view, no doubt whatever about the inherent jurisdiction of this court to authorize remuneration. That, therefore, decides the question of jurisdiction and I must now proceed to consider on what scale I should allow remuneration in the present case.

* BADDELEY AND OTHERS (TRUSTEES OF THE NEWTOWN TRUST) v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

Revenue—Stamp duty—Charity—Conveyances of property to trustees on trusts for "... social and physical training and recreation" and "the moral social and physical well being of persons resident "in" named localities who "are members or likely to become "members of the Methodist Church"—Not for relief of poverty—Recreation not charitable—Whether "members of the Methodist "Church" a section of the community—Conveyances properly assessed to ad valorem stamp duty as voluntary conveyances or conveyances on sale—Finance Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 35), ss. 52 (1), (2); 54 (1).

By the first of two deeds of even date land on which were a mission church, lecture room and store was transferred to trustees: and by the second four other pieces of land were transferred to them, and it was directed that a specified sum be held as though it were capital money arising from the sale of those pieces of land.

Shortly, the trusts were, of the first deed: (a) the promotion of the religious, social and physical well-being of persons resident in West Ham and Leyton by the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction; (b) the social and physical training and recreation of such persons so resident as were (i) in the opinion of the leaders for the time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission members or likely to become members of the Methodist Church and (ii) of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the trust; (c) the promotion and encouragement of all forms of such activities as were calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons: and of the second deed, (a) the promotion of the moral, social and physical well-being of persons resident in the same boroughs and with the same qualifications as to religious belief and means as in the first deed: (i) by the provision of facilities for moral, social and physical training and recreation and (ii) by permitting and encouraging all forms of such activities as were calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons.

The Commissioners held that both deeds fell to be stamped under Sch. 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891, as either conveyances on sale or voluntary conveyances to be treated as such under section 74 of the Finance (1909–1910) Act, 1910; and that they were accordingly liable to ad valorem duty at the rate of £1 for every £50 under section 52 of the Finance Act, 1947. The trustees appealed against the assessments, contending in each case that the stamp duty ought to be at one half that rate, on the ground that the conveyances were made to "a body of persons established for charitable purposes only "or to the trustees of a trust so established" within section 54 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947. Thus, the question in each case was whether the appellants were trustees of a trust established for charitable purposes only.

Held, dismissing the appeals, (1) that the trusts of the deeds were not for the relief of poverty, as no question of need was involved; Spiller v. Maude (1886) 32 Ch.D. 158n. and In re de Carteret [1933] Ch. 103 (48 T.L.R. 555) distinguished; (2) that, as one of the purposes was "recreation," they were not for objects which were charitable in the legal sense, and so did not come within the fourth category of Lord Macnaghten's classification in Special Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel [1891] A.C. 531, 583 (7 T.L.R. 657) as being "for other purposes beneficial to the community." Trustees of Londonderry Presbyterian Church House v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1946) 27 T.C. 431 ([1946] N.Ir. 178) followed. Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1947] A.C. 447 (63 T.L.R. 352) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 513); Shillington v. Portadown Urban District Council [1911] 1 Ir.R. 247; In re Hadden [1932] 1 Ch. 133 (48 T.L.R. 9) and In re Nottage [1895] 2 Ch. 649 (11 T.L.R. 519) considered.

Semble, that Methodists resident in West Ham and Leyton constituted a section of the community, united by adherence to or inclination towards a form of Christianity and having a territorial qualification; so that the court, had it held that recreation was a charitable object, would have held in the present case that the purpose was public recreation.

APPEALS by cases stated.

These were appeals by way of cases stated from decisions of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, under the Stamp Act, 1891, that two conveyances, both dated August 21, 1951, and made in favour of the appellants, fell to be stamped under the First Schedule to the Act, as either conveyances on sale or voluntary conveyances to be treated as such under section 74 of the Finance (1909–1910) Act, 1910, and, accordingly, were liable to ad valorem duty at the rate of £1 for every £50 under section 52 of the Finance Act, 1947. The appellants contended in each case that the stamp duty ought to be at one half of that rate, on the ground that the conveyances were made to "a body of persons established "for charitable purposes only or to the trustees of a trust so "established" within the meaning of section 54 (1) of that Act.[1] In each case, therefore, the question was whether the appellants were trustees of a trust established for charitable purposes only.

The first deed transferred to the trustees land on which were already built a mission church, lecture room and store. The second transferred four pieces of land and dealt with a sum of BADDELEY v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

£10,000 as an endowment fund. Both conveyances bore the same date and were intimately connected, though the trusts were not stated in the same terms. The appellants, who were throughout called "the trustees," were directed to allow the property in each case "to be appropriated and used by the leaders for the "time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission under "the name of 'The Newtown Trust'," which was in the deeds referred to as "the Foundation." From that point the words of the two deeds diverged. The first, which was the conveyance of the mission church, lecture room and store, provided as follows in clause 2 (a) and (b): "The trustees shall permit the said "property to be appropriated and used by the leaders for the "time being of the Stratford Newtown Methodist Mission under "the name of 'the Newtown Trust' (hereinafter called 'the "'Foundation') for the promotion of the religious social and "physical well being of persons resident in the County Boroughs "of West Ham and Leyton in the County of Essex by the "provision of facilities for religious services and instruction and "for the social and physical training and recreation of such afore-"mentioned persons who for the time being are in the opinion "of such leaders members or likely to become members of the "Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy "the advantages provided by these presents and by the provision "of facilities for religious social and physical training and "recreation and [sic] by promoting and encouraging all forms of "such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and "well being of such persons. . . . (b) The trustees may from time "to time: (i) maintain the said property or any part thereof as a "centre for religious services and instruction and for social and "physical training and recreation."

The second deed, which dealt with the four pieces of land adjacent to the mission hall comprised in the first deed and described as being "laid out as a playing field and upon parts "of which a pavilion and a groundsman's bungalow have been "erected" provided by clause 2: "(a) The trustees shall permit "the said property to be appropriated and used . . . for the "promotion of the moral social and physical well-being of persons "resident in the County Boroughs of West Ham and Leyton in "the County of Essex who for the time being are in the opinion "of such leaders members or likely to become members of the "Methodist Church and of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy "the advantages provided by these presents by the provision of "facilities for moral social and physical training and recreation "and by promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities "as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of "such persons. . . . (b) The trustees may from time to time: "(1) maintain the said property or any part thereof as a ground "for moral social and physical training and recreation." The £10,000 was to be held on trust as though it were capital money arising from the sale of land settled by the second deed.

On both of the cases stated, each of which was dated August 13, 1952, the questions for the opinion of the court were (1) Was the conveyance liable to duty as assessed by the Commissioners? (2) If not, to what duty was it liable?

December 18. HARMAN J., reading his judgment, after stating the facts, continued:—There are in both deeds limitations over on the failure of the primary trust, but in my judgment these do not affect the present question. Charity, we are taught, covers a multitude of sins, but whether that doctrine ought to extend to the draftsman of these documents may, I think, well be doubted. It was conceded by the Crown during the argument before me that the first deed contained words to which no meaning could be attached, and which must have been inserted by mistake. The words are these "and by the provision of "facilities for religious social and physical training and "recreation and." If these words are treated as cut out of the clause the trusts may be paraphrased as follows:

(a) The promotion of the religious social and physical well-being of persons resident in the County Boroughs of West Ham and Leyton by the provision of facilities for religious services and instruction.

(b) The social and physical training and recreation of such persons so resident as are (i) in the opinion of the leaders members, or likely to become members of the Methodist Church, and (ii) of insufficient means otherwise to enjoy the advantages provided by the trust.

(c) The promotion and encouragement of all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons.

The trusts of the second deed are more shortly stated and may be thus paraphrased:

(a) The promotion of the moral social and physical well-being of persons resident in the same boroughs and with the same qualifications as to religious belief and means as in the first deed.

(1) By the provision of facilities for moral social and physical training and recreation and

(2) By promoting and encouraging all forms of such activities as are calculated to contribute to the health and well-being of such persons.

For the purposes of what follows I may exclude trust (a) in the first deed which would seem to be a charitable object as being for the advancement of religion. What then remains? In my judgment, the two deeds in other respects are in terms so alike that they can be considered together. Are the objects stated exclusively charitable, that is to say, are there objects for which the trustees could allow the property to be used which are not charitable objects? They could, in my judgment, without a breach of trust, allow the property to be used either for the physical training or for the recreation of persons resident within the named boroughs, provided those persons either are of the Methodist belief in the leaders' opinion, or in that opinion likely to become so, and are also of insufficient means to enjoy the advantages provided. These advantages may, in my judgment, include so far as the hall is concerned social activities such as tea parties or dances, or recreations such as whist drives, table tennis or billiards; and so far as the playing field is concerned (which I note in passing was formerly the property of a body called the Gaiety Lawn Tennis Club Ld.) lawn tennis or any other open air game.

It was not argued before me that by reason of the connexion of the Foundation with the Methodist Church these trusts could be said to be for the advancement of religion, an argument advanced without success in the North Irish case Trustees of the Londonderry Presbyterian Church House v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [7] which I shall have to refer to again. But it was sought to uphold them on two grounds: first, that they were for the relief of poverty, and, second, that they came within the fourth category of Lord Macnaghten's classification in Special Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel [8] as being "for other "purposes beneficial to the community."

I will deal first with the poverty qualification. This is based on the words in the Statute of Elizabeth the "relief of aged "impotent and poor people." I must ask myself whether these words cover the provision of facilities for playing, for instance, billiards or lawn tennis for people who could not otherwise afford to do so. If there were no authority, I should at once answer that this was not relief of the poor. "Relief" seems to connote need of some sort, either need for a home or for the means to provide for some necessity or quasi-necessity and not merely an amusement however healthy it is.

The definition of poverty for the present purpose is not without authority. It does not mean absolute want or grinding need. For instance, Sir George Jessel M.R. appears to have held in Spiller v. Maude [9] (reported as a note to Pease v. Pattinson) that a fund was charitable although recipients of bounty under it might have an income up to £250 a year. The authorities on the subject are collected in Maugham J.'s decision in In re de Carteret,[10] where he came to the conclusion that there might be a good charity for the relief of poverty though the persons to be benefited are by no means destitute. It is, however, to be observed that the class of persons whom Maugham J. there declared to be the objects of charity were widows with young children whose income was not more than £120 a year, and who were thus very much in need of an allowance to help them bring up their children. In my judgment Mr. Stamp was justified in his submission that this is not a poverty case at all, because no question of need is involved.

There remains the question whether the trust is charitable on the other ground alleged. As to this the House of Lords has recently pointed out in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [11] that an object may be of great public utility but still not be a charity. The headnote reads as follows: "Every "object of public general utility is not necessarily a charity, "for in order to be charitable a trust must be within the spirit "and intendment of the statute 43 Eliz. 2, c. 4. Accordingly, no "trust can be charitable unless it is beneficial to the community "in a way which the law regards as charitable."

Lord Simonds says [12]: "My Lords, there are, I think, two "propositions which must ever be borne in mind in any case "in which the question is whether a trust is charitable. The "first is that it is still the general law that a trust is not "charitable and entitled to the privileges which charity confers, "unless it is within the spirit and intendment of the preamble "to the statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4), which is expressly "preserved by section 13 (3) of the Mortmain and Charitable "Uses Act, 1888. The second is that the classification of "charity in its legal sense into four principal divisions by Lord "Macnaghten in Income Tax Commissioners v. Pemsel [13] must "always be read subject to the qualification appearing in the "judgment of Lindley L.J. in In re Macduff [14]: 'Now Sir "'Samuel Romilly did not mean, and I am certain Lord "'Macnaghten did not mean, to say that every object of public "'general utility must necessarily be a charity. Some may "'be, and some may not be.' This observation has been "expanded by Lord Cave L.C. in this House in these words: "'Lord Macnaghten did not mean that all trusts for purposes

" ' beneficial to the community are charitable, but that there " ' were certain beneficial trusts which fell within that category; " ' and accordingly to argue that because a trust is for a purpose " ' beneficial to the community it is therefore a charitable trust " ' is to turn round his sentence and to give it a different " ' meaning. So here it is not enough to say that the trust in " ' question is for public purposes beneficial to the community " ' or for the public welfare; you must also show it to be a " ' charitable trust. See Attorney-General v. National Provin- " ' cial and Union Bank of England.' [15] But it is just because " the purpose of the trust deed in this case is said to be bene- " ficial to the community or a section of the community and " for no other reason that its charitable character is asserted. " It is not alleged that the trust is (a) for the benefit of the " community and (b) beneficial in a way which the law regards " as charitable. Therefore, as it seems to me, in its mere state- " ment the claim is imperfect and must fail."

If I were free to do so, I should hold that recreation is not a charitable object. It was argued before me that this is not so having regard to the views of the legislature on this subject, and I was referred to two Acts, first, the Physical Training and Recreation Act, 1937, which set up a national council for physical training and recreation and empowered the Board of Education and local authorities to spend money on playing fields for the use of organizations having athletic objects, and, secondly, to the Education Act, 1944, by section 53 of which the education authorities are enjoined in connexion with schools to provide adequate facilities for recreation and to provide playing fields for persons enjoying State education. I do not feel impressed by these statutes which provide, no doubt, admirable activities in connexion with education and for the benefit of the public, but the State nowadays spends a deal of money on objects which no one could consider charitable in the legal sense.

I was also referred to Shillington v. Portadown Urban District Council [16] in which Barton J. held that the application of money for providing the means of healthy recreation was a good public charitable purpose in the context in which it appeared in that will. Barton J., after reciting the words of the will, which were, " For the purpose of fostering, encouraging " and providing the means of obtaining healthy recreation, " including the teaching of singing in classes or choruses, for the " residents of the town of Portadown and the surrounding " districts, and for the purpose of providing music and instru- " ments (in so far as my trustees think advisable) for the town " band," said [17]: " This direction to the trustees as to the " application of the balance or residue of the income of the trust " estate constitutes, in my opinion, a valid charitable devise and " bequest. The testator's purpose was a charitable or public " purpose. He wished to benefit the residents of his native town " and of its immediate neighbourhood. The benefits which he " intended to confer on them were such as he believed to be of " public advantage. That belief was rational and not contrary to " the laws of the land or the principles of morality."

I was referred further to the case of In re Hadden [18] where Clauson J. held that provision of means for public recreation is a charitable object within the Statute of Elizabeth. After referring to Shillington v. Portadown Urban District Council,[19] and to certain Acts of Parliament, and in particular to the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, he said: " That " section enacts that Part II of the Act, which relates to " assurances to charitable uses, shall not apply to an assurance " of a limited amount of land for the purposes of a park, garden, " or other land dedicated or to be dedicated to the recreation of " the public. That enactment seems to me necessarily to involve " that in the view of the legislature dedication of land to the " recreation of the public is dedication to a charitable use; and in " face of that enactment I am, I conceive, bound to hold (nor " am I at all reluctant so to do) that the provision of means for " public recreation is a charitable object within ' the meaning, " ' purview and interpretation ' of the preamble to the Act of " 43 Eliz. c. 4."

Against these authorities must be set the decision in In re Nottage [20] distinguished by Clauson J. on the ground that " mere " sport was no doubt not charitable. I find it difficult to see why the addition of the word " mere " constitutes a distinction, and why public recreation is not tantamount to " mere " sport. Watching a football match on Saturday afternoon may claim to be the most popular public recreation in this country, but I feel that a fund devoted to providing gate money could not be held to be a charitable activity without passing that bursting point referred to by Lord Russell in In re Grove-Grady.[21] However this may be, I am not without guidance in the form of Trustees of Londonderry Presbyterian Church House v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [22] where the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland held that property conveyed subject to trusts very similar to the present, was not exempt from tax under a statute similar to the English statute. The trusts are stated as follows in the headnote: " The Appellant Trustees held certain properties " ' upon trust to permit the same or any part thereof to be used " ' as a Hall for meetings or for Social or Recreation purposes in " ' connexion with the various Presbyterian Churches in the City " ' of Londonderry and the surrounding district or as a Hostel or " ' Boarding House or as a Library or for such other . . .

" ' purposes as the Board of Governors . . . shall . . . think " ' fit, it being the true intention and meaning of these presents " ' that the said premises shall be used for the purposes of " ' assisting and helping in religious moral social and recreative " ' life of those connected with the Presbyterian Church in the " ' City of Londonderry and surrounding district in such manner " ' as the said Board of Governors . . . shall . . . think " ' right '."

Lord MacDermott, then a judge of first instance, held these to be charitable trusts as falling within Lord Macnaghten's fourth category, but he was reversed in the Court of Appeal. I find the following passage in the judgment of Andrews L.C.J.[23]: " The " authorities, whose number is legion, upon whether particular " trusts fall within or without Lord Macnaghten's fourth " category, baffle all efforts on my part to reconcile them with " one another, and no useful purpose would be served in the " circumstances by reviewing them. Judicial minds have " operated not always consistently on facts admittedly different; " and the result can only be described as in a measure chaotic. " I shall simply content myself with saying that I find nothing " in the statutes referred to which would assist me in holding " that the trusts in the present case for religious, moral, social " and recreative purposes, excluded as I have held them to be " from Lord Macnaghten's third class, fall within the fourth " class as a valid charitable trust. The test is not whether the " objects or purposes aimed at are beneficial to or receive the " general acceptance of the community. It is simply whether " they conform or not to the requirements and essentials of a " legal charity." This is a tax case which I find to be of high persuasive authority, and I think that I ought to follow it, and to hold that the trusts in the present case are not charitable.

Had I favoured the appellants on this point as to recreation, there would still remain a difficult question as to whether the purpose was " public recreation." Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[24] above cited shows that one of the qualifications is that the object must be public; that is to say, it must benefit the community or a class of the community. This is, perhaps, best stated in Verge v. Somerville.[25] Applying the opinion there expressed to the present facts, this trust is confined to the inhabitants of two boroughs—so far so good—but not to all the inhabitants, but only to persons of insufficient means and either Methodists or likely to become Methodists. Now these three qualifications must all rest on the decision of the leaders. Whether a man is of insufficient means and a Methodist can, I suppose, be satisfactorily ascertained as a fact. Whether he is likely to become a Methodist is not ascertainable with any certainty, and it is argued that a body of persons so qualified cannot claim to constitute a class of the community, but are a mere shifting body of individuals.

It has recently been held in Oppenheim v. Tobacco Securities Trust Co. Ld.[26] that the nexus of employment was not sufficient, and it is said that this is far more definite than the nexus of being likely to become a Methodist. This question has been much canvassed recently, beginning with the judgment of Lord Greene M.R. in In re Compton[27] and going on with the case of In re Hobourn Aero Components Limited's Air Raid Distress Fund[28] and I do not pretend to be a master of all its niceties. Nor is it necessary that I should decide it having regard to the view already expressed.

It was, however, fully argued before me, and it may be right, that I should state my conclusion. On the whole, it seems to me that this is a section of the community. Its members are united by adherence to or inclination towards a form of Christianity. They must have a territorial qualification, as was held in Goodman v. Mayor of Saltash[29] and they must pass a means test. The nexus is not a personal one. I cannot subscribe to the view expressed by Babington L.J. in the Irish case already cited that adherence to the Presbyterian faith in the town of Derry will not do. I prefer the contrary views of Lord MacDermott and Andrews L.C.J. If Presbyterians in Derry are not a class for this purpose, then Jews in Whitechapel are not, nor Christians in Hoxton, and it seems to me that this kind of reasoning leads to absurdity. Accordingly, if I had held that recreation was a charitable object, I should have held that the purpose here was public recreation.

As it is, I dismiss the appeals.

The defendants, a statutory dock authority, administered a dock under special Acts as modified and amended by other and general Acts, the special Acts incorporating the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, except so far as expressly varied by or inconsistent with them. From 1951, the plaintiffs as tug owners had provided services for towing in and out of the dock vessels engaged in shipping and unshipping goods at the dock. In March, 1952, the defendants sought to exclude the plaintiffs' tugs from competing with their own tugs save on their own terms. They claimed the right to do so as owners of the dock and by virtue of the provisions of sections 66 and 70 of the special Act, the Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Act, 1901.

Held, that by virtue of section 33 of the Act of 1847 all persons and vehicles, including tugs, were entitled, on payment of the appropriate dues, to freedom of access to the dock for the shipping and unshipping of goods. Nothing in the special Acts made it compulsory for ships to use the defendants' tugs, or expressly or by implication entitled the defendants to exclude the tugs of others. Accordingly, the plaintiffs were entitled in the ordinary course of their business to employ their tugs in providing towage services to vessels entering or leaving the dock for the shipping or unshipping of goods and/or embarking or landing of passengers.

ACTION.

The facts, as stated by Sellers J., were as follows:—

The plaintiffs, J. H. Pigott & Son, carried on a family business as steam tug owners, which had provided tug services at Union Dock, Grimsby, since 1886. During 1951 and 1952, they extended their services to the Immingham Docks in the County of Lincoln. The defendants, the Docks and Inland Waterways Executive, administered Immingham Docks, under delegation from the British Transport Commission, under and subject to statutory powers and restrictions derived as follows: The Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Act, 1901, authorized the construction of a dock adjoining the existing docks at Grimsby. The Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Act, 1904, empowered the Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Company to construct a new dock and abandon that which had been authorized under the Act of 1901. Both the Acts by section 2 respectively incorporated the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 [1] (except so far as expressly varied by or inconsistent with the Acts), and by section 17 of the Act of 1904 various sections, including sections 66 and 70 [2] of the Act of 1901, were made to apply to the dock, railway and other works authorized by the Act of 1904 as if they had been re-enacted in that Act. Provision was made for the abandonment of the original works, and section 53 of the Act of 1904 and the third schedule to that Act authorized a lease for 999 years of the new dock and works to the Great Central Railway Company. By the Railways Act, 1921, and S.R. & O. 826 of 1923, the London & North-Eastern Railway acquired the rights of both the lessors and the lessees and became owners of the whole undertaking. By the Transport Act, 1947, the dock became vested in the Transport Commission, and by an executive order came under the control of the defendants in 1948.

The defendants owned two tugs which, until 1951, performed most of the towage services required at Immingham Docks, and the tugs of the plaintiffs and others from Hull made only occasional visits. But during 1951/52 the export of coal from Grimsby, mainly coastwise, greatly increased, the British Electricity Authority in particular loading regular cargoes of coal from the port. In response to direct requests, and because there was an obvious need for tugs, the plaintiffs acquired two small-sized tugs suitable for the type of vessels frequenting Immingham Docks. Their tugs were available, frequently patrolling the river off Immingham Docks awaiting engagement, and were much employed. Although the traffic of the docks had greatly increased, the defendants' own tugs were often idle during 1951/52, having lost the trade to their competitors the plaintiffs, who were apparently supplying a more attractive service.

S. 70: " The company for the pur- " poses of and in connexion with the " dock may build purchase contract " for or hire or license and may main- " tain and use steamers tugs lighters " and other ships and boats and may " fix such rates or charges as may " appear to them reasonable for or in " respect of the use thereof and such " rates or charges shall be paid by " the owner agent master consignee " or other person having charge of " any vessel obtaining or demanding " the assistance or use of any such " steamers tugs or lighters or other " ships or boats to the company or the " person with whom they may con- " tract (as the case may be) and such " rates and charges shall be due and " payable whether such steamers tugs " lighters or other ships or boats shall " be actually employed or not Pro- " vided the assistance or use thereof " shall have been required and shall in " consequence of such requisition have " been tendered by the master or other " person having the command of such " steamer tug lighter or other ship or " boat Provided always that nothing " in this Act contained shall be deemed " or construed to authorize the com- " pany to require any owner agent " master consignee or other person " having charge of any vessel lighter " or river craft to employ hire or use " any such steamer tug lighter or " other ship or boat."

In March, 1952, the defendants threatened generally to exclude tugs (which were in substance the plaintiffs' tugs only) from providing tug services for vessels entering and leaving Immingham Docks and to restrict and reserve the necessary towage services to their own tugs or tugs hired by them under a formal hiring agreement. They submitted a draft of such an agreement to the plaintiffs, and in form stated that they were prepared to enter into agreement with the plaintiffs for the hire of their tugs. The defendants' documents disclosed, however, that they had little intention of calling on the services of the plaintiffs' tugs under any agreement entered into, preferring to hire tugs from a firm in the somewhat more remote port of Hull.

The plaintiffs thereupon instituted proceedings for a declaration that on payment of the rates made payable under the Humber Commercial Railway and Dock Act, 1901, and any statutory amendment or modification thereof, they were entitled in the ordinary course of their business to employ their tugs in providing towage services to vessels entering or leaving Immingham Docks for the shipping and unshipping of goods and/or the embarking or landing of passengers.

By their defence the defendants admitted that the object of excluding the plaintiffs' tugs was to prevent competition so that full employment might be provided for their own tugs. They further admitted that there was a greater demand for towage services than they could supply with their own tugs, but stated that they proposed to meet that by an arrangement for hiring additional tugs as and when required from Hull. They relied on the powers conferred on them by statute and on their powers as owners of the dock.

J. H. PIGOTT & SON v. DOCKS AND INLAND WATERWAYS EXECUTIVE.

December 16, 1952. SELLERS J. stated the facts and continued:—The whole question depends on whether the defendants, as the body responsible for the dock undertaking, are entitled to exclude tugs of the plaintiffs and others, and reserve towage services to their own tugs or such as they wish to hire to assist the services.

The plaintiffs claim that section 33 of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, gives them a right to take their tugs into the defendants' docks for such purposes at least as they have been recently engaged in and for which alone they contemplate using them in the future. The marginal note to the section is as follows: "Harbour, dock, and pier to be free to public on "payment of rates." The section provides: "Upon payment "of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and "subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and "pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping "of goods, and the embarking and landing of passengers." The section provides that the docks shall be open to all persons. It does not say "to all ships or vessels," but it clearly includes them. The freedom of access is limited by the words "for the "shipping and unshipping of goods." To be open for the shipping and unshipping of goods a dock must of necessity be open for many and varied activities in and about the dock without which there could be no shipping or unshipping of goods. There could be no shipping of goods without a ship or without goods. Both must enter the dock. In ordinary circumstances, and certainly those which exist at Immingham, goods destined for shipment require a vehicle of some kind to get them to the ship's side, and in many cases, and frequently at Immingham, a ship requires a tug or tugs to get her to her berth for loading. Likewise goods have to be removed by vehicle from the quay after discharge, and ships have to be moved out after loading or discharge.

A tidal river flows past the entrance to Immingham Docks, and a vessel entering and leaving has to allow for the effect of the current on the ship's course and manoeuvres. There is a risk of fouling the piers or jetties at the entrance, and to ensure safe movement to and from a berth in the dock a tug is frequently used by a vessel entering or leaving, and some vessels use more than one tug. For shipping and unshipping to take place in any commercial or business sense, it is necessary to employ skilled stevedores and labourers to load, discharge, trim, stow or otherwise handle the cargo on the ship and on the quay.

In interpreting the section, I would hold that any of the persons providing any of the facilities which I have mentioned and the persons engaged in such activities are persons to whom a dock must be open if it is to be open for the shipping and unshipping of goods. I can see no real distinction between the contractor who, by his vehicles, brings in the goods for shipment or removes them after discharge, the tug owner who, by his tugs, brings in and takes out vessels engaged in the shipping and unshipping of goods, and the shipowner who brings his ship to the port aided or unaided by tugs. They are all performing services without which goods cannot be shipped or unshipped by vessels using the port; and the section makes no discrimination between persons. Providing that they resort to the docks for the shipping and unshipping of goods they are on an equality, and the shipowner does not appear to have any greater or better right than a stevedore or a haulage contractor, or, I could add, a tug owner, though the rights of all are subject to the payment of the appropriate dues which the dock authority may prescribe and subject to any regulation and control which the authority may have power, expressly or impliedly, to exercise.

The section in question has been considered by the courts and once by the House of Lords, but the present case is not, I think, precisely covered by authority; and, having stated the view to which I incline on the construction and application of the section, I must see whether authority supports or refutes it.

In London and North-Eastern Ry. Co. v. British Trawlers Federation Ld.[12] Lord Tomlin, referring to section 33 of the Act of 1847, said[13]: "I do not think that the words 'shipping' and "'unshipping' are to be confined to the narrow operation of lifting "goods from the quay to the ship or from the ship to the quay, "nor do I think that the access under the section can be limited "to access in person without any vehicle. It must I think be "such access with such vehicle as the party seeking it bona fide "deems necessary, but it is an access always subject to be con-"trolled by valid and operative by-laws." Lord Macmillan expressed his opinion in this way[14]: "The harbour is to be open "to all for the purpose of unshipping goods. It is manifest that "this must include the consequential purpose of removing the "goods unshipped, and such removal necessitates the employ-"ment of the appropriate vehicles."

Those are not the narrow interpretations for which the defendants contend, and I think that they support and do not curtail the views expressed in the Court of Appeal in the same case.[15] Scrutton L.J. said[16]: "A great deal of discussion took "place as to the true meaning of this section. Counsel for the "railway company argued, without, I think, much conviction, "that 'unshipping' had a very limited meaning; it only covered "the operation of transferring goods from the ship to the quay, "and the dock company had full control over the subsequent "operation of taking the goods from the quay out of the dock "premises. This argument, besides being quite unbusinesslike, "gave no effect, in my opinion, to the words 'shall be open to the "'public.' The passenger has a right to 'embark' by entering "the dock premises, proceeding to the ship and embarking

" thereon; he has a right to ' land ' by leaving the ship and pro" ceeding over the dock premises to their limits. The ' shipper '
" of goods has a right to bring them on to the dock premises, and " through those premises to the ship on which they are shipped.
" He has a right to ' unship ' them by taking them from the ship " and out of the dock premises." Further on, the same Lord Justice said [17]: " I am clearly of opinion that the unshipper has " a right to the use of reasonable vehicles, motor or horse-drawn,
" subject to reasonable regulation by the dock company as to " pace, place and time, having regard to the reasonable rights " of other members of the public and of the dock company. I " am also of opinion that the dock company has no right to " impose limitations on what the vehicles properly used in " shipping or unshipping shall do outside the dock premises."
Lawrence L.J. said [18]: " In my opinion, the provision in section
" 33 of the 1847 Act, that upon payment of rates, the harbour " and dock shall be open to all persons for shipping and unship-
" ping goods, necessarily implies that all persons shall have the " free right to remove the goods landed on the quays by the usual
" commercial means." Greer L.J. said [19]: " I think it is neces" sarily implied in section 33 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers
" Clauses Act, 1847, that their docks and quays should be open " to all such persons as were interested in the shipment or unship-
" ment of fish to remove the fish so unshipped by usual com" mercial methods, including the removal by means of motor or " other vehicles, or by their agents or contractors in that behalf
" by such vehicles."

In Dick v. Badart [20] Cave J. held that section 33 must include not only shipowners and owners of goods, but also their respective servants. He held a by-law to exclude lumpers to be invalid, and said [21]: " A by-law that lumpers should only be employed subject " to good character might be within the company's power to " regulate the duties and conduct of persons employed in the " dock, but a by-law by which lumpers are altogether excluded " from the dock could not possibly be within it."

Another case on the section is Great Central Ry. Co. v. North-Eastern Steam Fishing Co. Ld.,[22] the report of which was supplemented by the defendants by a transcript of the judgment of Walton J.[23] The decision is an authority for the proposition that section 33 of the Act of 1847 does not give trawler owners a right to keep a tug inside the dock for the purpose of rendering towage services as and when required to their own trawlers which regularly go in and out. The plaintiffs do not challenge this case, and make no claim to keep a tug inside the Immingham Docks or to ply for hire within the dock or at the jetties, which plying for hire, other than by the defendants' tugs, can only be done in pursuance of a licence issued by the dock-master. That is by-law 18. Walton J. did not seek to interpret the section except to say that it did not give the defendants, the trawler owners, the right to keep a tug inside the dock without the consent of the dock authority.

If the facts had been found as they were stated to be in the argument of Mr. J. A. Hamilton K.C.[22]—" The tug was required " to move the trawlers sometimes to the wharf or to a place " awaiting their turn to unload, or to a place where coal could " be loaded, or to bring coal lighters alongside, or to move the " trawlers to a place in the dock where ice (required for the " purposes of the next fishing voyage) could be taken on board. " The tug was necessary to move the trawlers after the boilers " had been blown, in accordance with the by-laws. Such assist- " ance was absolutely necessary and was used in the ordinary " course of business "—I doubt respectfully if I would have taken the same view of them as Walton J. appears to have done. It would depend, I think, on the frequency with which those services were normally rendered by the tug kept in attendance, but the actual decision was as I have stated, and it does not bear on the present case.

On behalf of the defendants the railway cases are relied on, Barker v. Midland Ry. Co.[24] and Perth General Station Committee v. Ross,[25] but they are of no application. It was so held in the British Trawlers case.[26] Section 33 of the Act of 1847 did not, of course, arise for consideration at all in those cases.

I am therefore of opinion that authority does not refute the interpretation which I have given to section 33, but substantially supports it, and, as it stands, section 33 would entitle the plaintiffs to enter the dock with their tugs in the manner which has been their recent practice and which is their present demand.

The section is, however, made expressly subject to any special Act, and the defendants rely further on their powers as owners and undertakers, and on sections 66 and 70 of their Act of 1901. Before considering those two sections, I will refer briefly to an authority which defines the position of a statutory body in the position of the defendants. In the British Trawlers case in the Court of Appeal Scrutton L.J.[27] referred with approval to the observations of Lindley L.J. in London Association of Shipowners and Brokers v. London and India Docks Joint Committee,[28] as follows: " The Legislature has expressly conferred upon the com- " pany many powers which the company, as the owner of " property, could have exercised without any express statutory " authority. Whenever this is the case, the powers expressly " given must be treated either as superfluous or as purposely " inserted in order to define, that is, limit the right conferred, " and as implying a prohibition against the exercise of the more " extensive rights which the company might have by virtue of its " ownership of property. That the latter is the true mode of " regarding statutory powers conferred on bodies created for " public purposes and authorized to acquire land for such " purposes cannot, I think, admit of any doubt."

Greer L.J. in the British Trawlers' case,[29] pointed out the distinction between companies created by charter, which are deemed to have all the powers of a natural person, and companies created by statute. He quoted the then current edition of Buckley on Companies and the statement therein that a " statute " does not create a corporation at common law. It creates a " statutory creature, which cannot go beyond its statute for the " reason that to the statute it owes its whole existence."

Section 70 of the defendants' Act of 1901 empowers the defendants to build, purchase, hire or license steamers and tugs for the purpose of and in connexion with the dock, and to make charges in respect of the use of any such vessels provided and used; and at the end of the section there is this proviso: " Pro- " vided always that nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed " or construed to authorize the company to require any owner " agent master consignee or other person having charge of any " vessel lighter or river craft to employ hire or use any such " steamer tug lighter or other ship or boat." The defendants, therefore, cannot make it compulsory for ships to use their tugs, and since the use of tugs, lighters or boats will, or may, from time to time be necessary, and since the port has to be open to the public for the shipping and unshipping of goods, it follows, I think, that if tugs other than the defendants' tugs were excluded, the rights of the users of the port would be curtailed and infringed. If shipowners wished to use the port, and if tug assistance was essential to enable them to do so in safety, the use of the defendants' tugs (and this would include those chartered or hired by them) would in effect be compulsory and the defendants would so achieve that which they are so definitely prohibited by the proviso from doing. Far from giving the defendants the right to exclude tugs, as they now claim to do, in my opinion section 70 effectively prohibits them from so doing. The proviso does not refer only to the section, but also to " nothing in this Act." The proviso, therefore, refers equally to section 66 (1) on which the defendants place perhaps their greatest reliance.

Section 66 in terms gives the company powers " with regard " to the management use and regulation of the dock works of the " company and the regulation and control of vessels resorting " thereto." Nowhere is an express power given to exclude tugs. It is submitted on behalf of the defendants that section 66 (1) by implication gives that power. In the face of the proviso to section 70 to which I have just referred, I do not find it possible to make such an implication.

Section 66 (3) empowers the company to employ persons "to "work or remove or to discharge or load or perform any service "in connexion with any vessel," when there is delay or default in the working or removing of any vessel in the dock. Section 66 (1) makes these rights of the company "subject to the right "of the owner or master of any vessel to employ his crew in the "performance of any of the services" mentioned in the other three subsections of section 66. The whole section gives defined powers to the company, but it does not give them exclusive powers or any power to exclude which they do not otherwise possess.

In contrast, section 82 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, which relates to meters and weighers, expressly provides that "the master of any vessel, or the owner "of any goods shipped, unshipped, or delivered within or upon "the harbour, or dock, or pier, shall not employ any person "other than a weigher or meter licensed by the undertakers." This was referred to by Cave J. in Dick v. Badart [30]; and see also Port of London Authority v. Cairn Line of Steamships Ld. [31] Similar clear clauses are to be found in many other Acts, where some exclusive right was intended to be given to undertakers. There is no such provision here relating to tugs. The words of Lord Davey in Municipal Corporation of City of Toronto v. Virgo [32] may be applied to the present case: "No doubt the "regulation and governance of a trade may involve the "imposition of restrictions on its exercise both as to time and "to a certain extent as to place where such restrictions are in "the opinion of the public authority necessary to prevent a "nuisance or for the maintenance of order. But their Lordships "think there is marked distinction to be drawn between the "prohibition or prevention of a trade and the regulation or "governance of it, and indeed a power to regulate and govern "seems to imply the continued existence of that which is to be "regulated or governed."

In my judgment, the plaintiffs have established the right for their tugs to enter the Immingham Docks at least to the extent for which they claim, and there is no power in any statute affecting the defendants' rights which entitles the defendants to exclude tugs operating in the way the plaintiffs' tugs have been doing. The interdepartmental correspondence of the defendants to which I was referred revealed less desire on the part of those responsible for the port's administration to have the tug services at Immingham highly efficient and adequate than to stultify competition to benefit their own tugs, which apparently could not hold their own in a busy port. So far as I understand the position, the decision at which I have arrived is more likely to

GREAT CENTRAL RAILWAY CO. v. NORTH-EASTERN STEAM FISHING CO. LD.

WALTON J. The plaintiffs, the Great Central Railway Co., are the owners of a dock or docks at Great Grimsby, the fish docks, and the defendants, the North-Eastern Steam Fishing Co. Ld., and the other defendants are the owners of the steam-tug Speedwell. The claim is as follows: By letters dated February 29, 1904 (addressed to Mr. Simons, the then owner of the said steam-tug), September 12, 1904, and July 1, 1905, notice was given on behalf of the plaintiffs, terminating the permission previously given from time to time by them for the steam-tug to occupy their fish docks, and to perform towage services for hire therein, and requiring the defendants to remove their steam-tug from the fish docks; and it is said that the defendants have not removed their steam-tug from the fish docks but persist in unlawfully occupying the fish docks and performing towage services for hire therein with their steam-tug without any leave or licence from the plaintiffs, and in spite of the plaintiffs' notices. The plaintiffs claim a declaration that the Speedwell is not entitled to remain in their docks, and they claim an injunction and damages.

It is admitted that the fish docks at Great Grimsby belong to the plaintiffs—they are part of their undertaking, regulated by the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway Company Act, 1849. With regard to the permission given by the plaintiffs before the controversy in this action began, the defendants say that if any such permission was given, it was ultra vires; they deny that they used the docks by permission of the plaintiffs, and they say that the notices given were ultra vires and were invalid as notices requiring the defendants to remove their tug. They say they have not used the docks otherwise than in a reasonable manner; and then they go on to say this: The defendants' fishing vessels are entitled to reasonable user of the docks, and, according to the usual course of trade and user of the docks, they require to be moved from time to time by tugs available at call for that purpose. The plaintiffs threaten and intend to exclude the defendants' tug and to compel them to use the plaintiffs' tugs only, which they have no right to do. The defendants further say that they have not claimed, and do not claim, to keep their steam-tug in the plaintiffs' docks except for the purposes mentioned; and they admit that if they do use the docks they must do so under the regulations and by-laws which have been properly made from time to time under the Act of Parliament.

The use which the defendants say they have a right to make of the docks with their tug, as I understand it, is this. The defendants are owners of a number of steam trawlers, which bring their fish from time to time into the fish docks at Great Grimsby; they enter the docks and usually get alongside the quay under their own steam. They discharge their fish at the quay, and then, before they go out to sea again for fishing, they have to take on board a certain quantity of ice which they get in the docks, and a certain quantity of coal, and they have to be moved to another place where they get their ice, and to yet another place for their coal; or they have to be moored somewhere in the docks where they receive their coals from barges or lighters. That being so, of course these steam trawlers have to be moved about to a certain extent in the docks; and what the defendants claim is the right to keep this tug inside the docks, not for the purpose of bringing the steam trawlers into the docks, but for the purpose of moving them about, first one and then another, as required in the docks. They say that it is reasonable and convenient to have a tug always at hand in the docks for the use of these trawlers which have to be moved from time to time. The defendants are owners of a certain number of trawlers and there is no doubt that it is convenient for them to have this tug at hand inside the docks to move their trawlers as required. The question which I have to decide in this case is whether they have a right to keep their tug inside the docks for that purpose. They say that they have a right to have their tug there for such a purpose. The plaintiffs, the Great Central Railway Co., say: "No, these docks belong to us and you "have no right to keep a tug in our docks without our leave or unless "you have some agreement with us by which we consent that you "should do so under certain terms, and we do not consent and we will "not; you must take that tug away." I have to say which is right.

The special Act which relates to the user of these docks is the Act of 1849, which incorporates the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847. Many of the sections of the Act of 1849 were referred to, but I do not think that it is necessary for me to refer to them for the purposes of this judgment. I merely call attention to this—that by section 247 of the Act of 1849 the plaintiffs are entitled to provide tugs for the purpose of "towing and assisting vessels entering into, using, or "going out of the said docks," on certain terms and making certain charges which are not to exceed certain sums that are mentioned in the section. Of course, that does not settle the present case. It gives powers to the plaintiffs to provide the facilities, which the defendants desire to provide for themselves.

That being so, what are the rights? The plaintiffs are the owners of the docks; but I think it is plain that they cannot close these docks absolutely to the world at large. The public have certain rights. Is the right claimed by the defendants one of them? What are the public rights? So far as I can ascertain, they are to be found, and I think only to be found—at any rate so far as affects the present case—in section 33 of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847. [His Lordship read the section.] That is to say, all persons may take vessels into the docks for the purpose of shipping or unshipping goods, and they may send men to the docks, I think, to provide the labour necessary for the purpose of shipping and unshipping goods. (I leave out the embarking and disembarking of passengers, because that does not matter here.) I think they clearly may do that. It may be, but I have not to decide it, that persons are entitled to take their vessels into the docks, for the purpose of shipping or unshipping goods, in tow. It may be that the owner of a fishing smack is entitled to take his smack into these fish docks with the assistance of a tug. I have not to decide that. It may be, but perhaps it is more doubtful, that when a vessel goes into the docks, it may have a tug in attendance. I have not to decide that. What the defendants claim is this: the right to maintain what I may call the services of a tug inside the docks, and to occupy the docks for that purpose. Does section 33 give that right or not? I do not know that I ought to occupy time in discussing all the various arguments pro and con which were addressed to me in the course of the trial. I think it is enough for me to say that the conclusion I have arrived at is, that the defendants have no such right without the consent of the plaintiffs, and that they are not entitled to keep their tug inside the docks for the purpose of assisting such of the steam-trawlers as go into the docks, and as are the property of the defendants. I noticed in the points of claim that it is alleged that they claim or seek to keep the tug inside the docks to perform towage services for hire. I do not think in the course of the case I heard anything of the tug Speedwell being used for hire. I understand it was there to be used for the purposes of the trawlers which belong to its owners. Therefore I have not attached any importance to the claim that the tug is to be retained there for hire, because I do not think it is.

I think substantially the plaintiffs succeed.

Contract—Repudiation—Written agreement—Construction—Reliance on bona fide but mistaken construction not repudiation—Whether acceptance must correspond with repudiation.

Export distributors contracted in writing to pass on to manufacturers customers' orders for goods of not less than £80,000 in any one year for a number of years. Owing to import restrictions on the continental market, they were unable to obtain sufficient orders. In negotiations with the manufacturers, they said that their obligations under the contract did not go beyond passing on to the manufacturers whatever orders they received, and, though they would do their utmost to obtain orders, they were not responsible to do more. The manufacturers wrote referring to this statement and accepting it as a repudiation of the contract and holding the defendants responsible in damages resulting from repudiation.

On appeal from Streatfeild J., who held that the distributors repudiated:—

Held, that in the circumstances of the case, the conduct of the distributors did not evince a clear intention not to be bound by the contract. They had expressed an erroneous construction of the contract but it was apparently held by them in good faith and was not an unreasonable construction to put on the contract. They had and were doing their best to fulfil the contract and did not intend to repudiate it.

JAMES SHAFFER LD. v. FINDLAY DURHAM & BRODIE.

APPEAL from Streatfeild J.

In 1945 the defendants began negotiations with the plaintiff company, who were manufacturers, with a view to supplying sanitary fittings, such as taps and bibcocks, manufactured by the plaintiffs, to the continental market, and particularly to Germany. The defendants, who were what is known as a "confirming "house," were to obtain the orders for the goods and to some extent to confirm them, and the plaintiffs would remunerate them on a percentage basis for the orders passed on to them. On July 11, 1945, the defendants wrote the following letter: "For "attention of Mr. G. J. Shaffer. Dear Sirs, We are very pleased "to have been able to conclude arrangements with you for the "manufacture of special sanitary fittings required for export to "overseas markets and which were previously only manufactured "in Germany. For the present we are confining our requirements "to a restricted range of patterns, but we hope that in the near "future, when your works are in full production, it will be found "possible to extend the range of fittings for which similar "components such as headwork can be utilized. From our con-"versations you will have gathered that we expect to be in a "position to place before you some very interesting continuous "business in these lines. We now enclose our opening order."

On September 8, 1945, the parties made an agreement to commence from August 1, 1945, and to continue for a term of three years. Paragraph 1 provided: "In consideration of your "giving us the benefit of all your orders for special sanitary "fittings for overseas markets we undertake to manufacture "exclusively for you, under your own trade mark, those special "export types of sanitary fittings as per samples and particulars "already furnished, and for which we have now accepted orders, "also for similar and further designs to be discussed from time "to time."

The business developed and both parties profited for a time. Shaffer was busy opening up a new factory at South Shields for his company where they would manufacture the goods, and one Sondheim of the defendants helped him in arranging the set-up. Sondheim was of German extraction but had been in the United Kingdom for some years. He was an expert on the manufacture of sanitary fittings and well acquainted with the German market for them. In the early days of the business orders were out-stripping production. The factory was not completed for some time and the machines were not all installed until 1947, some even a little later. By March, 1947, the plaintiffs were, however, producing bibcocks, bottle traps and pillar taps, though there was some difficulty in the production of the pillar taps which was not overcome until about February, 1948. The position was not, however, entirely satisfactory from the plaintiffs' point of view. They were expending large sums of money in establishing a factory for the manufacture of the goods, and there was no certainty as to whether orders would flow continuously or not. They discussed this with the defendants, and after some time it was decided that there should be a formal long-term agreement between the parties.

The draft of the agreement was prepared by the solicitors for the plaintiffs, and was entered into by the defendants on March 20, 1947 (acting, apparently, without the advice of solicitors). Clause 4 (c) of the agreement read: "That this agreement shall "commence on March 1, 1947, or upon such other date as may "be agreed upon by the parties and shall remain in force until "February 28, 1962, unless determined on February 28, 1957, "by either party giving to the other six months' previous notice "in writing." In other words, the agreement was for 15 years, with the option to either party to cancel it at the end of 10 years by giving six months' notice before the 10 years expired.

The parties to the agreement were five men trading as Findlay Durham & Brodie, referred to as the export distributors of the one part, and the limited company, James Shaffer Ld., of the other part, and it recited: "Whereas (1) The export distributors "and the manufacturers have for some time hitherto traded the "one with the other in goods set out in clauses 1 (a) and 1 (b) "hereto (hereinafter referred to as 'the goods') under the terms "of an agreement dated August 1, 1945. (2) The export distri- "butors and the manufacturers have agreed for the considerations "hereinafter contained to enter upon this present agreement."

By clause 1 (a) of the agreement: "The export distributors "undertake to buy exclusively from the manufacturers all their "requirements for all markets of all types of water fittings com- "prising bibcocks, pillar taps, bidet taps, undertile stopcocks, "mixing valves which the manufacturers manufacture and which "do not conform to the requirements of any British Waterworks "Association member or of any Dominion local authorities." That clause dealt with manufactures which were not for use in the United Kingdom, and the export distributors undertook by clause 1 (b) to buy exclusively from the manufacturers all their requirements for all markets of all the named types of fittings which the manufacturers produced.

Clause 1 (b) provided: "The export distributors undertake to "buy exclusively from the manufacturers bottle traps, pop-up "wastes, flexible tubes, mixing valve components and any similar "fittings which may be agreed upon from time to time by the "parties for export to those countries where neither the require- "ments of a member of the British Waterworks Association nor "of a Dominion local authority apply. Countries in which "water fittings are not required to conform to the specification "of the members of the British Waterworks Association or of "a Dominion local authority shall be hereinafter referred to as "'the countries.'"

By clause 2: "The export distributors will:—(a) ship the "goods which are supplied by the manufacturers and delivered

" f.o.b. United Kingdom port to the purchasers in the countries. " . . . (c) Do all in their power to further the trade in and " export of the goods in the countries. (d) Continue to advise " and assist the manufacturers in the design manufacture and " production of the goods. . . . (j) Will receive by way of " remuneration an allowance of fifteen per cent. discount off the " value of the manufacturers' invoices after deduction of the " cost at cost for packing and cases. (k) Pass on to the manu- " facturers customers' orders for the goods amounting to not less " in volume than the volume of goods which at present prices " would amount to the value of £80,000 in any one year spread " over intervals to conform with the manufacturers' capacity for " production. (l) Pass on to the manufacturers orders (for the " goods of such size as will be economic to manufacture and " enable the manufacturers to produce) in accordance with " present procedure."

That clause dealt with the obligations of the export distributors under the agreement.

By clause 3 of the agreement: " The manufacturers in con- " sideration of the undertakings hereinbefore given by the export " distributors undertake for themselves and their assigns that " they—(a) Will supply exclusively to the export distributors the " water fittings enumerated under clause 1 (a) " with a proviso. " . . . (d) Will pass on to the export distributors any orders " and inquiries they may receive directly or indirectly for export " to the countries. (e) Will pay to the export distributors fifteen " per cent. of the price charged for the goods after deduction at " cost to the manufacturers of packing wrapping and cases. . . . " (h) Will accept from the export distributors and give delivery " of orders for the goods amounting to not less in volume than " the volume of the goods which at present prices would amount " to £80,000 in any one year."

Clause 3 (h) corresponded with the obligation which the export distributors undertook by clause 2 (k) to " Pass on to the manu- " facturers customers' orders for the goods amounting to not less " in volume than the volume of goods which at present prices " would amount to the value of £80,000 in any one year," etc.

By proviso 4 (d): " If at any time there should be a marked " decline in the total of orders in hand to such extent that this " total amounts to less than three months' work in hand as " compared with deliveries made during the preceding six " months and based on the same value calculated on the average " prices at which the goods were delivered during that period, " then the manufacturers may ask for an explanation of the " export distributors for the reason of such decline. If the " explanation given by the export distributors is not deemed " satisfactory by the manufacturers then the manufacturers shall " have the right on notifying the other party in writing of their " intention so to do to approach the countries direct for additional " business always provided the manufacturers do not offer the "goods at lower prices or on more advantageous terms than "those agreed to be quoted by the export distributors and always "provided the export distributors are given the option of handling "the finance and shipping of such new business at a reduced "commission of seven and a half per cent. on the f.o.b. value "of the goods required."

At the date when the agreement was signed, March 20, 1947, the manufacturers were not manufacturing all goods of the types mentioned in clauses 1 (a) and (b), and they never did in fact manufacture all the types of articles mentioned in clause 1 (a). The business was conducted on the following "procedure": The export distributors gave an order from time to time, and if the order was for something which the manufacturers were not then manufacturing, they would start up new orders for the manufacture, and in the course of a few months the article would be manufactured.

The agreement continued in operation from March 20, 1947, for about 15 months, until May 27, 1948. During that period the defendants gave orders for goods to the plaintiffs, and it was admitted that all the orders which were given were supplied.

By the early months of 1948 the plaintiffs had overcome their manufacturing difficulties in regard to the making of pillar taps and sink mixers and the production of these articles was, accordingly, speeded up. About the same time, however, the British Government withdrew the requirement that half the output of the plaintiffs must be for the home market. Meanwhile the issue of import licences in Scandinavia and Holland was suspended. As a result the number of orders passed on to the plaintiffs by the defendants declined rapidly. Shaffer became very worried about the position, and, in February, 1948, he consulted the defendants. On April 23 they wrote reassuring him: "Dear Sirs, We enclose a list of orders we have "taken for clients in Holland, Denmark, and Norway, and con- "firmed to them in the form of pro forma invoices subject to "import licences being granted. We also enclose two letters "from our Dutch agent regarding the position of import licences. "Further communications received from him since are to the "effect that the matter is still in abeyance, but he is still hopeful "of receiving licences. The orders are mainly for chromium "plated bibcocks, pillar taps and flexible tubes, and to a certain "extent also for bath and sink mixer fittings. Should the two "latter articles be considered luxuries under the present circum- "stances and for that reason import licences not be given, it "would affect the total of orders only to a negligible extent. "As you know, the literature required for opening up further "markets is only now coming to hand and we have so far been "handicapped for want of catalogues and samples. We are, how- "ever, already in touch with markets in the Middle East and "South America, and also hopeful of being able to meet local "competition in Belgium."

At that time, therefore, the defendants were still hopeful of receiving licences; to some extent they had been held up by the plaintiffs through lack of literature, but that was now coming forward. The documents which were enclosed showed pro forma invoices for £57,800 (of which £34,700 came from Holland). These invoices were not orders, properly so called, but they, or some of them, probably would have become orders if import licences could have been obtained, and the defendants were hopeful that they would obtain them.

Very few orders, however, came through. By May, 1948, production of the fittings had outrun the orders and the plaintiffs had in their factory material and component parts of a value of over £36,000, including finished goods of a value of £16,000. The company was in great financial difficulties and Shaffer said in evidence that they were unable to pay wages. The stock which was piling up was specific to the continental market, and, in any case, the home market was in a depressed state owing to the restrictions on building. Shaffer consulted Sondheim and one Muriel, a defendants' representative. Both were sympathetic but said that they had had hundreds of cancellations from overseas, so that they too were in great difficulties. Sondheim said that the best thing they could do was to have a meeting with all the partners. He said that the defendants would assist the plaintiffs financially and take over some of the stock. Unfortunately, before that meeting could be held Sondheim was taken ill and, as a result of his illness, he lost his memory. A meeting was, however, held between Shaffer and one of the defendants, one Freeman. Freeman declined to give financial assistance to the plaintiffs and said that, as a confirming house, they could not possibly take over the stock or any part of it. He was sympathetic with the plaintiffs' difficulties but did not admit any liability under the agreement to pass on more orders to them than his company had actually obtained. He referred again to the large number of pro forma orders which had only failed to materialize because they were unable to overcome the currency restrictions and to obtain import licences for the continental market. After that interview Shaffer wrote on May 1:

" Dear Sirs, re Sanitary Fittings Agreement. Further to our " recent meeting when it was explained to me why there was a " marked decline in orders, and that you were uncertain as to " whether these fittings which we are manufacturing are good " saleable stock, you will appreciate that we find ourselves in a " very difficult position. We do not wish if possible to give up " manufacturing these fittings as it would be some time before we " could go back to them in the event of a revival of trade. We " have, therefore, decided after consultation with our auditors to " go on manufacturing these fittings and under clause 4 (d) of our " agreement endeavour to dispose of some of them to overseas " buyers whom we hope to meet at our stand at the British Indus- " tries Fair. In order to accomplish this we have given these

" continental fittings a position on our stand instead of arranging " to show them in the office as previously. We have also arranged " to have available a representative to deal with inquiries of this " kind. As we understand that you will not be able to send a " representative to take Mr. Sondheim's place we are going to " carefully try and deal with any of the customers who will be " coming to meet Mr. Sondheim at the stand on your behalf as " best we can, although you will appreciate it will be impossible " to replace Mr. Sondheim with his years of experience and " intimate friendship with these buyers. We feel sure you will " appreciate the step we have taken as being one in our joint " interest and hope that it will not be long before we can go back " again to our normal procedure." The plaintiffs did not, however, get any orders from the continent, and so they were no better off.

On May 18, there was a further meeting, between Shaffer for the plaintiffs and Durham and Brodie for the defendants. They also brought their representative Muriel. Shaffer gave evidence as to this meeting. He said that the defendants again expressed great sympathy. Durham said: " Everybody wants your goods, " but cannot get import licences. We could sell hundreds of " thousands of pounds worth." Shaffer then said: " Well, we " have an agreement under which you undertook to take not less " than £80,000 worth a year." The defendants produced the agreement and said: " Look what it says—customers' orders. We " have given you all the customers' orders we have had. How " can we give you something we have not got? This is quite " clearly a case of force majeure," and Brodie added: " I " was not in this country when this was signed, because if I had " been here I would not have let it be signed." Shaffer asked for financial help again and was told it was impossible. The defendants said they had no liability to give £80,000 worth of orders. They would do all they could to get orders, and would pass on whatever orders they got but there was no liability to do anything further.

In cross-examination, he said that the defendants made it clear that they would do their best to get orders, but, that since their expert Sondheim had become ill, they had nobody with comparable knowledge of the market.

After the interview Shaffer consulted the solicitors to the company, and on May 27, they wrote: " We have been instructed " by our clients, Messrs James Shaffer Limited of Riverdrive, " South Shields, in relation to the contract between you and them " of February, 1947. We are informed by our clients that you " have failed to fulfil your obligation under the contract and have " in particular failed to satisfy clause 2 (k) thereof, by which you " undertook to pass on to our clients, customers' orders for goods " amounting to not less in volume than the volume of goods which " at prices existing at the date thereof would have amounted to " the value of £80,000 in the course of a year spread over as in "that clause provided. The total of such orders last year does "not reach that figure and there has been no improvement in "the commencing months of this, the second year, so that our "clients are forced to the view that you have no intention of "fulfilling this obligation. Our clients take the view that your "conduct is such as to repudiate the contract which repudiation "we hereby on our clients' behalf accept. We further are "instructed and hereby give you notice that our clients intend "now to treat the contract as at an end. We give you notice "also that our clients reserve the right to hold you liable for such "damages as they have sustained as a result of your breaches "of the contract."

Between March 20 and May 27, 1947, the defendants had passed on to the plaintiffs orders for about £30,000 worth of goods. Afterwards they placed a further £16,000 "without "prejudice."

On June 15, 1948, the plaintiffs commenced proceedings, claiming damages, resulting from, first, the breach by the defendants of clause 2 (k) of the agreement of March 20, 1947, in failing to pass on to the plaintiffs as manufacturers "customers' orders for the goods amounting to not less in "value than . . . £80,000 in any year," and, second, damages resulting from the repudiation of the agreement by the defendants. Streatfeild J. held that the defendants were liable under both heads and ordered that the damages should be assessed by the official referee. The defendants appealed.

K. Diplock Q.C. and J. P. Ashworth for the defendant appellants.

Gilbert Paull Q.C. and S. K. de Ferrars for the plaintiff manufacturers.

The appeal under the first head [that the defendants were in breach of clause 2 (k) of the agreement of March, 1947] turns on the construction of the agreement, and clause 2 (k) in particular, and does not call for report. (The appeal under that head was dismissed.)

SINGLETON L.J. [having stated the facts and considered the construction of the agreement of March 20, 1947, said:] If one party to a contract before the time for performance has arrived declares his intention not to perform the contract, the other party to that contract may treat that as an immediate breach of contract if he thinks fit, and may bring an action for damages. That is the position which it is said was reached in this case in May, 1948.

In Heyman v. Darwins Ld. Lord Wright said[15]: "But "perhaps the commonest application of the word 'repudiation' "is to what is often called the anticipatory breach of a contract "where the party by words or conduct evinces an intention no "longer to be bound and the other party accepts the repudiation "and rescinds the contract. In such a case, if the repudiation "is wrongful and the rescission is rightful, the contract is ended "by the rescission but only as far as concerns future performance. "It remains alive for the awarding of damages either for previous "breaches or for the breach which constitutes the repudiation. "That is only a particular form of contract-breaking and would "generally under an ordinary arbitration clause involve a dispute "under the contract like any other breach of contract. There is "no difference, for instance, for this purpose between a refusal "to take further instalments under a contract for the sale of "goods by instalments and a refusal to take the entire contract "quantity where the tender is to be a single delivery. I need "scarcely add that one party to a contract cannot put an end "to it. To produce that effect there must be rescission. An "anticipatory breach does not necessarily involve an actual "intention to break the contract. Intention is to be judged by "the party's conduct. The difference between repudiating a "contract and repudiating liability under it must not be over-"looked. It is thus necessary in every case in which the word "repudiation is used to be clear in what sense it is being used."

In Freeth v. Burr[16] the headnote reads: "The defendant "contracted to sell to the plaintiffs 250 tons pig-iron at 56s. per "ton, half to be delivered in two, remainder in four weeks; "payment, net cash fourteen days after delivery of each parcel.

"The market was rising, and, notwithstanding urgent demands "by the plaintiffs, the delivery of the first 125 tons was not "completed for nearly six months. The plaintiffs refused to pay "for the first parcel, claiming a right to set off the loss they had "sustained from being obliged to procure other iron in conse- "quence of the defendant's default; but they still urged the "delivery of the second parcel. The defendant, treating the refusal "to pay as a breach and an abandonment of the contract by the "plaintiffs, declined to deliver any more. There was no sugges- "tion of inability on the part of the plaintiffs to pay, and the "price of the first parcel was ultimately paid:—Held, that the "mere refusal to pay for the first parcel did not, under the cir- "cumstances, warrant the defendant in treating the contract as "abandoned and refusing to deliver the remainder, and that the "plaintiffs were entitled to damages for the breach."

Lord Coleridge C.J. used these words[17]: "I mention that "because it is important to express my view that, in cases of "this sort, where the question is whether the one party is set "free by the action of the other, the real matter for considera- "tion is whether the acts or conduct of the one do or do not "amount to an intimation of an intention to abandon and "altogether to refuse performance of the contract. I say this in "order to explain the ground upon which I think the decisions in "these cases must rest. There has been some conflict amongst "them. But I think it may be taken that the fair result of them "is as I have stated, viz., that the true question is whether the "acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to "be bound by the contract. Now, non-payment on the one hand, "or non-delivery on the other, may amount to such an act, or "may be evidence for a jury of an intention wholly to abandon "the contract and set the other party free. That is the true "principle on which Hoare v. Rennie[18] was decided, whether "rightly or not upon the facts, I will not presume to say."

I do not read further the judgment of Lord Coleridge, nor do I read any passages from the short but valuable judgments of Keating and Denman JJ. in that case. The submission made on behalf of the defendants in this case is based upon the words of Lord Coleridge that, before there can be repudiation in a case of this kind, there must be acts or conduct which amount to an intimation of an intention to abandon and altogether to refuse performance of the contract. The question indeed is whether the acts and conduct of the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the contract.

In Mersey Steel and Iron Co. Ld. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co. Lord Selborne L.C. said[19]: "Upon the other point, I do not "think it desirable to lay down larger rules than the case may "require, or than former authorities may have laid down for my " guidance, or to go into possible cases differing from the one " with which we have to deal. I am content to take the rule as " stated by Lord Coleridge in Freeth v. Burr,[20] which is in sub- " stance, as I understand it, that you must look at the actual " circumstances of the case in order to see whether the one party " to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the " conduct of the other; you must examine what that conduct is, " so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute " refusal to perform the contract, such as would amount to a " rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other " party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part; and " I think that nothing more is necessary in the present case than " to look at the conduct of the parties, and see whether anything " of that kind has taken place here."

Lord Selborne expressly approved the passage which I read from the judgment of Lord Coleridge in Freeth v. Burr,[20] and that passage is recognized as a true statement of the law.

The difficulty is to apply it to any particular case, and one difficulty which arises comes from the words " You must look at " the actual circumstances." The learned counsel who have argued this case before this court took quite a different view of what are the actual circumstances to which we can have regard. Perhaps that is not unusual. None the less, it is our duty to look at the circumstances and to see what was done, to see what it is which is relied upon as repudiation by the defendants.

In Johnstone v. Milling,[21] Cotton L.J. said [21]: " Whether such " a statement amounted to a renunciation of the contract must " depend on the circumstances of the case and the nature of the " contract."

We know the nature of this contract, or we ought to do so now. We must look at the nature of the contract and at the circumstances of the case. I must refer to two lines from the speech of Lord Wright [22] in Ross T. Smyth & Co. Ld. v. T. D. Bailey, Son & Co.: " It must not be forgotten that repudiation " of a contract is a serious matter, not to be lightly found or " inferred." That applies, it seems to me, even more strongly if the contract is a long-term contract, a contract which was to run for 15 years, with the option of a break when 10 years had gone.

I draw attention to the value of the judgments of both Denman J. and Walton J. in Millars' Karri and Jarrah Co. (1902) v. Weddel, Turner & Co.[23] It is true, as Mr. Diplock says, that the learned judges there were dealing with a breach rather than an anticipatory breach, but I find every word in those two judgments to be most helpful.

Another case which was cited is the Spettabile case.[24] That case was heard before Bailhache J., who came to the conclusion

[21] 16 Q.B.D. 460, 471.
[22] [1940] 3 All E.R. 60, 71.
[23] 14 Com.Cas. 25.

that the terms of a letter written by one party to another amounted to a repudiation of the contract. Bailhache J. thought that that repudiation had not been accepted by the other side. The case went to the Court of Appeal, and the Lords Justices thought that the terms of the letter did not amount to a repudiation, but agreed with the view of Bailhache J. that there was in fact no acceptance. (It would not help if I said that I feel a certain amount of sympathy with the view of Bailhache J. on the first head.)

The following passage in the judgment of Atkin L.J. is of great value [25]: "A repudiation has been defined in different "terms—by Lord Selborne as an absolute refusal to perform "a contract; by Lord Esher as a total refusal to perform it; "by Bowen L.J. in Johnstone v. Milling [26] as a declaration of "an intention not to carry out a contract when the time arrives, "and by Lord Haldane in Bradley v. H. Newsom, Sons & Co. Ld. [27] as an intention to treat the obligation as altogether at an "end. They all come to the same thing, and they all amount at "any rate to this, that it must be shown that the party to the "contract made quite plain his own intention not to perform the "contract." That is how Atkin L.J. put it. It is not very different, really, from the way in which Lord Coleridge put it in Freeth v. Burr, [28] so that I think I may say the law is fairly clear upon the matter, but the application of it to particular facts may not be equally easy to ascertain.

The other reason for mentioning the Spettabile case [29] is that the action which was before the court in that case was commenced on May 26, 1919, and the judgment of Bailhache J. was given on June 6, 1919. At the commencement of his judgment Bailhache J. said: "In this case I am asked to exercise, I think, one of the "most useful functions of the commercial court—namely, to say "between parties to contracts whether those contracts are still "binding upon them. That is a function of the court which "saves parties in commercial transactions from a great deal of "uncertainty and a great deal of money. It is a function which "this court is always pleased to exercise when asked, and I desire "to say that in cases of this kind the court is always ready to "hear it at the shortest possible notice. In this particular instance "the case came on for hearing before me yesterday, within some "10 or 12 days after the issue of the writ. The system would be "perfect but for one thing that cannot be avoided—namely, the "frailty of human judgment."

Atkin L.J. said [30]: "No doubt questions of great difficulty "arise between commercial men. And there are great uncertainties whether a contract between them will be performed or "whether it will put them in the very gravest difficulty unless "the dispute can be determined by the courts. The procedure

JAMES SHAFFER LD. v. FINDLAY DURHAM & BRODIE.
Singleton L.J.

" before the court is now open to them, which is unchallenged, " by which they can come to a court and in a very short time " have those disputes resolved. That they can do without ex- " posing themselves to the risk of having to take a definite course " in repudiating a contract which, if it is wrong, may involve " them in a very large sum of money." That was in 1919.

For more than 40 years the commercial court has been in existence, and very largely through Mathew J. and Bray J. it achieved a position under which the commercial world knew that it could resort to that court and get a point decided in a very short space of time, and if there was need for a journey to the Court of Appeal, that journey could be made speedily too. I think it is a matter for regret that the commercial world has ceased to make use of the commercial court to the extent to which it did. There was a dispute, or a disagreement, between the parties, as to the construction of a clause in this contract. Either party could have gone to the commercial court and have had that point determined at short notice. At that time there was only the disputed construction of the contract; the question whether there was a repudiation arose later. The commercial world was grateful in years gone by to those who arranged the working of the commercial court. I think myself the legal profession ought to pay more attention to it than it does now. If the point of construction had been decided in 1948, it might have been decided in half a day, and a great deal of what has taken place four years later would have been avoided, the costs of both sides would have been immeasurably less, and both parties would have been the richer.

His Lordship then considered the circumstances which were said to have amounted to repudiation and went on: At the interview on May 18, 1948, the parties took a different view of the obligation of the defendants under the contract. Mr. Paull submits that they merely expressed a different view, and that there was nothing to show that the defendants really held the view they expressed. I have heard, however, nothing in this case which causes me to doubt their good faith. They were in difficulties, so were the plaintiffs, and they raised a question as to the meaning of the clause in the contract which compelled them to pass on orders to the extent of £80,000 in a year. The construction they adopted was not, I think, correct, but I have no reason to doubt that the defendants thought that it was a tenable view, and I have no reason to doubt their good faith. There was no evidence from the defendants' side on this part of the case.

What is the result of it all? The contract of which 15 months had run had another $8\frac{3}{4}$ or $13\frac{3}{4}$ years to run; there had been preparations on both sides to carry it out; the defendants were anxious to do their best to implement the contract. That is understandable, because if they could pass forward £80,000 worth of orders at the rate of 15 per cent. commission to them, they would be entitled to £12,000, which is a considerable sum of money. They were anxious for the contract to go on, but the necessity for obtaining import licences was an obstacle, an obstacle which might be removed in time, but no one knew whether it would be removed. The parties had entered into a kind of trade which, in the events that happened, involved the obtaining of import licences from certain countries on the continent, and, for reasons best known to them, the countries in some cases had shut down that business for the time being, and were not granting import licences. If that difficulty had been removed there was no reason why good trade and business should not have followed to the advantage of both parties to the contract.

Mr. Diplock submitted that there was no repudiation; and, alternatively, that if there was repudiation, it was not the repudiation which the plaintiffs accepted in the letter of May 27. He said that in order for there to be an effective acceptance of a repudiation, it must be in the terms of the repudiation itself. Mr. Paull, on the other hand, submitted that, in the circumstances, and in view of the nature of the contract, there had been a repudiation by the defendants, and that there was a proper acceptance of that repudiation.

The plaintiffs pleaded in paragraph 5 of the statement of claim in the action: "The defendants did not pass to the plaintiff "company customers' or any orders for goods to the amount of "£80,000 in the year March 1, 1947 to February 28, 1948, nor "did they in each or any of the months of March or April or "May, 1948, pass to the plaintiff company orders to an amount "equal to one-twelfth part of £80,000, and the defendants expressly and/or impliedly by their conduct evinced an intention "not to be bound by or to carry out the said contract according "to its terms and the defendants thereby broke and repudiated "the said contract."

Upon that the defendants applied for particulars of the conduct relied on, and particulars under five heads were given, one of which (the fourth) is in these terms: "They on or about May 18, "1948, at an interview whereat were present Mr. Durham and "Mr. Brodie and the said Muriel acting for and on behalf of "the defendants orally informed the said Shaffer acting for and "on behalf of the plaintiff company that the defendants had not "by the said contract undertaken to pass on orders to the extent "of £80,000 a year but had undertaken to pass on customers' "orders to that value; that they had passed on all the customers' "orders they had and could not pass on what they had not got "and that they were absolved from any further obligation under "the said contract and did not intend to do otherwise for the "future and that the defendants ought not to have signed the "said contract."

So that it became clear that the plaintiffs were relying on that which was said at the interview of May 18. Those particulars were not delivered until December 10, 1948, and Mr. Diplock submitted that is not within the acceptance of repudiation in the letter of May 27 of that year. Moreover, he said, if the reason given in December, 1948, was the real reason, that was not a prompt acceptance of the repudiation for it was said many months afterwards. Thus a question might arise as to the meaning of the word " conduct " in the letter. I am inclined to the view that the repudiation which was accepted, or said to be accepted, by the plaintiffs in the letter of May 27, was the failure of the defendants to send forward sufficient orders, either in the first year or in the next three months. It does not appear from that letter that anything that had been said at the interview was relied on.

The real question is whether there was anything which can be said to amount to repudiation.

I have considered the authorities anxiously, and, in so far as I am able to do so, I seek to apply the law as laid down to the facts of this particular case. Streatfeild J. said that this was a very difficult case and near the line. I think that that is a true description. Sometimes when a case is put in one particular way it has great appeal, and, when it is put in the other way, it has an almost equal appeal. I do not think that it is right to look at the interview of May 18 alone; as I understand the law, it is our duty to have regard to the circumstances. I have referred to them. It is most important to bear in mind that this was a long-term contract, and I think it is important, too, to bear in mind that, when the interview of May 18, 1948, took place, the defendants were, on the construction of the contract which I adopt, a long way behind in orders. I am not sure how far one is entitled to have regard to the financial difficulties of the plaintiffs, who were unable to pay wages, but that may be an element, in view of the fact that it was made known to the defendants.

I go back to the words of Lord Coleridge in Freeth v. Burr [31]: " . . . the real matter for consideration is whether the acts or " conduct of the one do, or do not, amount to an intimation of " an intention to abandon and altogether to refuse performance " of the contract." I say this in order to explain the ground " upon which I think the decisions in these cases must rest. " There has been some conflict amongst them. But I think it " may be taken that the fair result of them is as I have stated, " viz., that the true question is whether the acts and conduct of " the party evince an intention no longer to be bound by the " contract "; or to the words of Atkin L.J. in the Spettabile case.[32] After he had cited definitions of repudiation he added: " They all come to the same thing, and they all amount at any " rate to this, that it must be shown that the party to the " contract made quite plain his own intention not to perform the " contract."

Mr. Paull submitted that when the defendants Brodie and Durham said "We are only under an obligation to pass forward "such orders as we get," they were saying "There is no "obligation on us to perform the contract, though we are ready "to perform another contract." I am not sure that that is right. The view of the defendants was: "We take the view "that under this contract we are only responsible to pass forward "the orders which we get, but we are going to do the best we "can," and they might have added: "We will do everything "possible, because on every order we get, we make something." In those circumstances, is it possible to say that the defendants, either by not sending forward orders, or by anything said at the interview, showed an intention to abandon and altogether to refuse the performance of the contract, or is it possible to say that, because they raised a question as to the construction of the contract, they evinced an intention no longer to be bound by the contract? I think not.

I felt the force of Mr. Paull's argument on the facts as to the small number of orders, and that in the first five months of 1948 only a few thousand pounds' worth of orders were passed to the plaintiffs, and on the evidence as to the interview. On the other hand, repudiation is, as Lord Wright said,[33] a serious matter. It is more serious than usual when it is exercised in regard to a contract which would run for 10 or 15 years. The parties to such a contract know, or if they do not know they have solicitors who can tell them, that there is quite an easy way to determine what the true construction of that contract is, as Bailhache J. and Atkin L.J. said in the Spettabile case.[34] The rights of the parties could have been ascertained at little cost and within a very short time. In those circumstances, the plaintiffs took upon themselves a risk in saying "You have repudiated this contract; we "accept your repudiation," a risk which, in my view, was unjustified. I think for these reasons their claim for damages on the basis of repudiation fails, and to that extent the judgment of Streatfeild J. is wrong. I would add that I can appreciate his difficulty; he expressed it himself.

As I have formed that view, it is unnecessary for me to consider a further point raised by Mr. Diplock that, as the reason for the acceptance of the repudiation given by the letter of May 27 is not the reason which is now relied on, or is not the real reason, the plaintiffs cannot have the benefit of that acceptance. It is a very interesting point; I am not sure that there is any decision of the courts upon it. There are some words in a speech of Lord Sumner which may be thought, at least by one side, to help. I do not think those words do help when they are examined. Nor do I think I should help the parties by expressing my view on this question. In my judgment, the submission of Mr. Diplock on the repudiation issue succeeds. The appeal ought to be allowed in part, but the judgment will stand for the assessment of damages, or such damages as may be found due to the plaintiffs, in respect of the breaches of contract which they committed by late deliveries during the 15 months for which the contract ran.

MORRIS L.J. [after stating the facts and considering the question of construction, said:] I come to the second part of the case, whether the defendants repudiated this contract—whether they evinced an intention no longer to be bound by it. Speaking for myself, I get the greatest assistance, considering all the cases which have been put before us, from the words used by Lord Coleridge C.J. in Freeth v. Burr.[35] I cite these two or three sentences: "I mention that because it is important to express "my view that, in cases of this sort, where the question is "whether the one party is set free by the action of the other, "the real matter for consideration is whether the acts or conduct "of the one do or do not amount to an intimation of an intention "to abandon and altogether to refuse performance of the "contract. I say this in order to explain the ground upon which "I think the decisions in these cases must rest. There has been "some conflict amongst them. But I think it may be taken that "the fair result of them is as I have stated, viz., that the true "position is whether the acts and conduct of the party evince "an intention no longer to be bound by the contract. Now, "non-payment on the one hand, or non-delivery on the other, "may amount to such an act, or may be evidence for a jury of "an intention wholly to abandon the contract and set the other "party free." I have read those words again, although they were read by my Lord, because I consider that one must begin one's inquiry as to the facts by having in mind the principle so clearly enunciated in those words.

Keating J., in his judgment in that case, refers to the "circumstances." He says: "But, looking at all the circum-"stances of this case," and then he went on to enumerate what they were in that case.

Lord Selborne, in Mersey Steel and Iron Co. Ld. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co.,[36] speaks of the actual circumstances. There was a similar reference in Johnstone v. Milling. Bowen L.J. said[37]: "We have, therefore, to consider upon what prin-"ciples and under what circumstances it must be held that a "promisee, who finds himself confronted with a declaration of "intention by the promisor not to carry out the contract when "the time for performance arrives, may treat the contract as "broken, and sue for the breach thereof. It would seem on "principle that the declaration of such intention by the promisor "is not in itself and unless acted on by the promisee a breach "of the contract; and that it only becomes a breach when it is

[36] 9 App.Cas. 434.
[37] 16 Q.B.D. 460, 472, 474.

"converted by force of what follows it into a wrongful renunciation of the contract. Its real operation appears to be to give the promisee the right of electing either to treat the declaration as brutum fulmen, and holding fast to the contract to wait till the time of its performance has arrived, or to act upon it, and treat it as a final assertion by the promisor that he is no longer bound by the contract, and a wrongful renunciation of the contractual relation into which he has entered. . . . We must construe the language used by the light of the contract and the circumstances of the case in order to see whether there was in this case any such renunciation of the contract."

The first of those two passages in the judgment of Bowen L.J. contains a reference which would be very material if it were necessary to consider the point raised by Mr. Diplock as to whether an acceptance of a repudiation must refer to and specify the repudiation which is alleged. In view of the conclusion I have reached in regard to the question whether there was repudiation, I do not find it necessary to say anything in regard to that topic.

I can summarize quite shortly the reasons why I have come to the conclusion, endeavouring to approach the matter on the lines indicated by Lord Coleridge, that there was no repudiation by the defendants in this case. It is very material, I think, that the contract was to extend over many years. Difficulties arose in 1948 which might have been of a temporary nature. It would be quite impossible to foresee what would happen in future years; it might easily be that orders would at a later time become numerous, and that they would be very much in excess of £80,000. Although I have come to the conclusions that I have expressed as to the wording of the agreement, I do not think that it can be said that the construction of clause 2 (k) suggested in the course of the interview of May 18 by the defendants was an absurd construction. In this connexion I think it is not unimportant to see the reaction on the mind of Streatfeild J., where he said: "There is something in it, is there not? How do you "pass on unless there is something to pass on?" [Mr. Gilbert Paull:] "I shall argue that anon, my Lord." [The witness:] "That is why I took it that at that time there was nothing I "had." [Streatfeild J.:] "I shall hear argument, of course, "about it."

I think that the construction put on the contract by the defendants was erroneous, but I do not think that it was impossible or a stupid point of view to suggest. In one sense it must be true to say that the defendants cannot pass on customers' orders unless they have them. They were under obligation under the agreement, as clause 1 (c) shows, to supply the manufacturers with full particulars of all purchases, including names and addresses of the customers to whom the goods were sold in the countries. If the defendants just had not got orders, they could not pass on customers' orders. As I have held, they had entered into a contract which was absolute in its terms, and if they failed to get customers' orders, and therefore failed to pass on customers' orders, they were in breach of the contract and were liable to pay damages. But they could not, actually, in fact, pass on customers' orders if they did not have customers' orders. There is no finding that the defendants were not doing their best to get orders; there are abundant references in the transcript showing that the defendants said that they were doing their best, and I see no reason to doubt that. It was very much in their interests to do their best: they wanted to do their best.

Mr. Paull has pointed to the fact that the partners did not give evidence in this case, but it does not seem to me that that matter can avail Mr. Paull. The evidence that is before the court is the evidence of Mr. Shaffer, and his evidence as to what took place at the interviews is accepted. There is no doubt that the position in May, 1948, was disastrous for the plaintiffs and one must indeed appreciate their difficulties from the practical point of view. They had constructed the new foundry; they had hoped for large orders; they had all the obligations of the foundry; they had to find wages each week; they had to deal with their bank, and they were undoubtedly in a position of very great difficulty. They asked that the defendants should relieve those difficulties. It does not seem to me that the defendants were unsympathetic, but they were not under obligation to assist in that respect; they were not under obligation to purchase certain material that was in the hands of the plaintiffs. Further, the plaintiffs were in difficulties because of what had happened to their own trade. [His Lordship considered the evidence of Shaffer and went on:] They were undoubtedly in very great difficulty, and it must have been a matter of supreme disappointment for Mr. Shaffer, having understood that orders would come, to find no improvement, but, on the other hand, a deterioration in the position.

I have all those facts in mind, but, nevertheless, it does not seem to me that the defendants evinced an intention to throw over this contract or to repudiate it. They had, I think, done their best; there is certainly no finding that they had not done their best. I have no doubt that they wanted to go on with the contract. The letter of May 27, to which my Lord has referred, certainly does not suggest that anything said at the interview had made a very big impression so far as repudiation was concerned. The interview of May 18 was the last of three interviews. Streatfeild J. does not find that there was any repudiation during the first two interviews, and Mr. Paull has said that he never so contended. If the defendants had been wanting to repudiate this contract, it seems to me that there would have been some effective hint of it in the first two interviews. The interviews also were sought not by them, but by the plaintiffs. I am not overlooking that one must judge not only by words and by motives, but by all the circumstances, and in the light of everything that was done. Endeavouring to do that, I have come to the conclusion that the defendants did not repudiate this contract, and did not evince an intention no longer to be bound by it. They took an erroneous view, but not one which was impossible or stupid, in regard to one clause of the contract; they had done their best; they had met difficulties which were unexpected both by them and by the plaintiffs; it was a sorry position for both sides, but I do not consider that the defendants had repudiated their contract.

UPJOHN J. I agree with what has been stated by my Lords, and I only desire to add a few words on two points. The first is one of the points of construction, and the second is the point upon which we are differing from Streatfeild J.

[His Lordship then considered the construction of the document and went on:]

On the other point, that of repudiation, as my Lord, Singleton L.J., has said, the difficulty in this case is not in stating what is the law, but in its application to the particular circumstances of this case. I do not desire to add anything to what has fallen from my Lords as to the law; I only desire, out of deference to Streatfield J., to state very shortly the circumstances which appear to me to be relevant in ascertaining whether the defendants were evincing an intention no longer to be bound by the contract, to explain why I am differing from him.

There are, I think, two cardinal matters to remember. The first is that this was a long-term contract; I need say no more about that; but, secondly, this was a joint adventure which was intended to break into entirely new ground. It was hoped that the market abroad in the sanitary fittings which had before the war largely been supplied from German sources would fall into the lap of the plaintiffs and the defendants, but, of course, when you are starting to enter hopefully into new markets altogether it frequently happens that, in the initial stages, performance sadly falls behind the promise, and, in my judgment, the admitted breaches of the defendants in the first year must be considered in that light. They were, no doubt, in breach; their deliveries for the first year had fallen sadly behind, and they were in breach of their obligations under clause 2 (k) of the contract. On the other hand, one must bear this in mind: the plaintiffs themselves would have been quite unable, admittedly unable, to fulfil orders for £80,000, or anything like it, had they been forthcoming from the defendants. They were having their teething troubles as well as the defendants. The factory had to be equipped; the staff had to be organized and operatives trained; and on top of all that for a number of months they had trouble in their foundry. They were not, however, in breach, for they were able to deliver all the orders which they in fact received from the defendants in a reasonable time. By April, 1948, Mr. Shaffer found the situation had seriously deteriorated, even compared with the modest performance of the first year's operation of the contract.

JAMES SHAFFER LD. v. FINDLAY DURHAM & BRODIE.
Upjohn J.

He found that, due to restrictions in foreign countries as regards imports, the foreign markets, while not closed, had seriously deteriorated. The plaintiff company was in serious financial difficulties, and was unable, indeed, to pay wages; but that, although partly due to the failure of the defendants to give orders under the contract, was due also, in part, to the fact that the home market, with which the defendants had no concern, had completely disappeared.

I think that it is important to appreciate the financial difficulties of the plaintiffs for this reason, and this reason only: It supplies the clue to the interviews that took place in April and May, 1948. I need not trouble with the first interview with Mr. Sondheim. At the second interview, which was sought by Mr. Shaffer, who saw one of the partners, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Shaffer asked for financial assistance, but his request fell on peculiarly stony ground. He then asked for another interview. I doubt not that he wanted to see other partners in order to try to persuade them to give him further financial assistance to tide over his difficulties. That, I think, is an important matter to have in mind. The interview was fixed for May 18. At it there is no doubt that both parties were anxious to continue trading, the one with the other; both parties were at their wit's end as to what to do; the defendants were at their wit's end as to how they were to get an adequate number of orders; the plaintiff company, through Mr. Shaffer, was at its wit's end as to how to get money to carry on its factory. It is not surprising, in those circumstances, that a question should arise as to the respective rights and difficulties of the plaintiff company and the defendants, and so it did. Mr. Shaffer stated that he had an unqualified agreement for the supply of £80,000 worth of orders a year. That was immediately challenged by the defendants, who said that they were only bound to pass on such orders from customers as they had been able to obtain, although they fully recognized their duty to do their utmost to obtain such orders. There was no lengthy discussion upon the matter. I respectfully agree with Morris L.J. when he says that the construction put upon clause 2 (k) by the defendants was not absurd or untenable, and I am wholly satisfied that the construction contended for was put forward in complete good faith; indeed, if clause 2 (k) is examined, as it might be, by a layman, ignoring the other clauses in the agreement, and ignoring the fact that the whole essence of the agreement was that there was to be the relationship of vendor and purchaser as between the plaintiffs and the defendants in relation to each order, it is possible that the construction contended for by Mr. Diplock was right.

Mr. Paull submitted that the defendants by their behaviour at this meeting, coupled with their earlier conduct, evinced an intention no longer to be bound by the contract. He said that their refusal to recognize that they were bound by an unqualified warranty under the contract to produce £80,000 worth of orders a year evinced such an intention. The argument so put is attractive, but, after all, it merely comes to this, that the defendants were putting forward honestly, as I have said, their view that, on the true construction of the contract, they were only bound to pass on such orders as they were able to obtain.

In all the circumstances of this case, I am quite unable to come to the conclusion that the defendants by their acts and conduct evinced an intention no longer to be bound by their contract.

In the absence of regulations under section 12 (2) (b) (ii) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the power of the Divorce Court under rule 65 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, to order security for a wife's costs remains, and it may do so even though both parties are legally assisted persons, but in that case it is very seldom that an application for security should be made.

An application was made under rule 65 (3) for security for the wife's costs in a divorce suit in which both parties were legally assisted persons, the National Assistance Board having assessed the petitioning husband's maximum contribution to the legal aid fund at £70 and the respondent wife's contribution as nil. The registrar, who had before him no other evidence as to the circumstances and means of the parties than the husband's legal aid certificate, ordered him to provide security to the extent of £20 :—

Held, that it was undesirable that there should be an order for security made against the petitioner on no information other than that which was before the National Assistance Board, and the order would be set aside.

On January 3, 1952, William Harold Evans filed a petition for a decree of dissolution of his marriage with Clara Ethel Evans on the ground of cruelty. The wife made application for legal aid, and, on February 9, 1952, she was granted a civil aid certificate to defend the suit. Her disposable income was stated to be £156, her disposable capital £8, and her maximum contribution to the legal aid fund was assessed as nil. On July 21, 1952, she filed an answer to the petition.

The husband also applied for legal aid, and, on September 18, 1952, he was granted a legal aid certificate, the National Assistance Board determining his disposable income at £296, his disposable capital as nil, and his maximum contribution as £70. The local committee assessed his contribution at the same sum, £70, payable by an initial instalment of £4 and then 11 monthly payments of £6 each.

On November 3, 1952, an application was made to the District Registrar of Brighton that he should order the husband petitioner to give security for the wife's costs of the hearing. The registrar had before him the civil aid certificate of the husband. He ordered that the husband should provide security to the extent of £20. The husband appealed to Collingwood J., who upheld the registrar, and from that decision the husband appealed again, both parties being assisted persons for the purpose of the appeal.

SINGLETON L.J. stated the facts, substantially as set out above, and continued:—The benefit of the legal aid scheme to the parties is apparent. The wife secures legal aid without contributing anything, and the husband, the petitioner, who has considerable earning power, has to provide £70 by instalments (which some years ago would have been enough to cover the costs of a petition of this kind). The benefit to him of the scheme is that he knows the extent of his liability, apart from the possibility of an order for costs being made against him later, and he is able to pay the money by instalments.

contributions which assisted persons are to make; and section 4 (6) provides: "Subject to the provisions of this section, a "person's disposable income and disposable capital, and the "maximum amount of his contribution to the legal aid fund "in respect of any proceedings, shall be determined by the "National Assistance Board, and the board may call attention "to any special circumstances affecting the maximum amount "of the lump sum and periodical payments which he could "reasonably make on account of any contribution." It was under that subsection that the National Assistance Board determined the maximum contribution, which the petitioner could make towards his own costs, at the sum of £70.

Section 12 provides: "(1) The Lord Chancellor may make "such regulations as appear to him necessary or desirable for "giving effect to this Part of this Act or for preventing abuses "thereof. (2) Without prejudice to the foregoing subsection or "any other provision of this Act authorizing the making of "regulations, regulations may . . . (b) regulate the procedure "of any court or tribunal in relation to legal aid, and in "particular make provision . . . (ii) as to the cases in which and "extent to which a person receiving legal aid may be required "to give security for costs, and the manner in which it may be "given." No such regulations have been made as yet.

Rule 65 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, provides: "Where an application for security has been made under this "rule, a registrar shall ascertain what is a sufficient sum of "money to cover the costs of the wife, and if, after taking all "the circumstances into account, including the means of the "husband and the wife, he considers that the husband should "provide security for all or some of the wife's costs, he may "order the husband to pay the sum so ascertained, or some "portion of it, into court or to give security therefor within "such time as he may fix, and may direct a stay of the "proceedings until the order is complied with." That states the power of the court when an application is made by a wife, who is in this case the respondent, for security for her costs. The present form of rule 65 (3) dates from 1947. It provides expressly that one of the matters to be taken into account on an application for security for costs is the means of the husband.

[His Lordship referred to the order made by the registrar and continued:] The husband appealed to Collingwood J. against that order, but the judge said that he was bound by Vincent v. Vincent,[7] and upheld the registrar.

Mr. Ranking, on behalf of the husband, put forward two submissions to this court. The first was that where both parties were legally aided, there was no power to make an order for security for costs. His second point was that, even if there was power, the making of the order for £20 security in this case was a wrong exercise of the discretion conferred on a registrar and that the order in question ought to be set aside.

EVANS v. EVANS.
Singleton L.J.

In December, 1950, there was before this court Conway v. Wimpey (George) & Co. Ltd.,[8] in which the plaintiff had been ordered to provide security for the costs of an appeal. Immediately thereafter, the plaintiff became an assisted person and an application was made that the order for security should be discharged. The judgment of the court was that, until the regulations envisaged by section 12 (2) (b) (ii) of the Act of 1949 were made, in the absence of special circumstances, an order for security for costs should not be made against an assisted person and, therefore, the order which had been made would be discharged. Cohen L.J., who gave the judgment of the court, said[9]: "Nonetheless, until we get the guidance of the regulations . . . "I think we must proceed on the basis that, generally speaking, "and in the absence of special circumstances, it would be "inappropriate to make an order for security for costs at a time "when an emergency certificate is in force." He was considering an order for security for costs made under order 58, r. 15 (2).

It was submitted by Mr. Kenneth Jones that quite a different position arose in this case, for this was an application for security for the wife's costs under rule 65 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. These rules, it should be noticed, were made after the Legal Aid and Advice Act of 1949, and, indeed, after the decision of the court in Conway v. Wimpey (George) & Co. Ltd.[9] In the absence of regulations under section 12 (2) (b) (ii), it cannot be said that the power of the Divorce Court to order security for a wife's costs has ceased. I think it remains, and a party, whether assisted or not, may make an application under the provisions of rule 65 even though the other party be an assisted party. The matter then has to be considered. At the same time, I think that it is very seldom that such an application should be made.

It seems to have been thought that the principle laid down in Conway v. Wimpey (George) & Co. Ltd.[9] should be taken to cover divorce practice as well. I am inclined to think it would have been a good thing if it had been so treated by the court, though the court was not then concerned with a matrimonial suit.

A practice direction was issued by the Senior Registrar of the Divorce Court, which I should describe as extremely useful from the point of view of practice, though Barnard J. seems to have thought that it was not worded quite rightly. This court was given to understand that the registrar at Brighton did not have it before him when considering this application. The direction is: "Legal Aid. Costs, security for. In the absence of any regula- "tions under section 12 of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, "the decision in Conway v. Wimpey (George) & Co. Ltd.[9] must "be taken to prevent the making of any order for security for "costs against an assisted person unless there are special " circumstances. The fact that a legally aided husband has been " directed by the local committee to pay a contribution less than " the maximum contribution may be regarded as a special " circumstance, and an order to secure for the wife's costs a sum " not greater than the difference between the actual and " maximum contributions may be made in a proper case."

In November, 1952, Barnard J. decided Vincent v. Vincent.[10] In that case the husband filed a petition for divorce on April 25, 1951, on the ground of his wife's desertion. On January 14, 1952, he obtained a civil aid certificate to enable him to carry on the proceedings. On July 22, 1952, the wife obtained a civil aid certificate limited to obtaining an order for security against the husband. On August 28, 1952, the wife's application to the registrar for such an order was dismissed on the ground that no order for security could be made against an assisted person. On appeal to Barnard J. it was held that it was a well-established practice in the Divorce Division that a wife had a right to apply for her security for costs, and that that was not affected by the husband being an assisted person, and, therefore, the registrar was bound to comply with rule 65 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, and the case would be referred to him for that purpose.

Barnard J., in giving his decision, pointed out that Cohen L.J. in Conway v. Wimpey (George) & Co. Ld.[11] was careful to make it clear that he was not seeking to lay down a general rule covering all classes of case and all circumstances, and continued: " The registry, by their direction, have interpreted the decision in " Conway's case as applying to a wife's application for security " for costs in the Divorce Division. I have come to the con- " clusion that this direction is a misinterpretation of the decision " in Conway's case. It is a well-established practice of this " division that a wife has a right to apply for security for her " costs, and Lord Merrivale P. once said, in In re A. B.'s " Petition[12] '. . . there is something in the nature of a prescrip- " ' tive right upon cause shown to secure to the wife the means " ' for defence.' "

Barnard J. then referred to Williams v. Williams,[13] where Hill J. said: " ' The main object of security, in recent years at " ' any rate, is that justice may be done by the wife being enabled " ' to procure the assistance of solicitor and counsel and come to " ' court. That is the main object in modern times. The old " ' basis for the rule, namely, that all the wife's property on " ' marriage passes to the husband, and therefore the husband " ' alone can foot the bill, has gone altogether, and now you " ' must consider whether in the circumstances the wife can foot " ' the bill, and it is a very important matter to consider whether " ' the solicitor can conduct the business without something in " ' court to pay him up to setting down and without security.' v.
EVANS.
Singleton L.J.

Barnard J. continued: "I think that the present case is a "different class of case from Conway v. Wimpey (George) & Co. "Ld.[14] by reason of the peculiar nature of a wife's security for "costs in the Divorce Division, which I have already indicated "and is not covered by Conway's case. I, therefore, allow this "appeal and refer the matter back to the Leeds registrar to "comply with rule 65 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. "The registrar will, of course, take into account the fact that the "husband is an assisted person and will also have regard to the "facts stated in the civil aid certificate and it may well be that "he will come to the conclusion that this is a case in which no "security should be ordered." Barnard J. upheld the power of the Divorce Court to make an order for security, even though the person against whom it is made was an assisted person. I have said that I think that that power remains. The judge pointed out that if the case went back to the registrar, he might well order nothing by way of security.

In this case now under appeal the wife was an assisted person. There was no difficulty about her coming to court with solicitor and counsel for she had legal aid. Application was made to the registrar for security for costs, but in my view it would have been better not to have made it. If the registrar had properly found himself able to make an order for security, it could only have been for a trifling amount, and the cost on both sides of getting the order is at the expense of the legal aid fund. Moreover, the customary practice, when an application of this sort is made, is to produce a supporting affidavit as to means and the like, and that costs a good deal of money. There was nothing like that before the court in this case. The registrar had the legal aid certificate before him and he indorsed the summons: "I have "referred to the petitioner's legal aid certificate for particulars "of the petitioner's means and consider he is able to give security "for £20." The legal aid certificate states, at least, that the petitioner had no disposable capital. Mr. Kenneth Jones pointed out to us that, notwithstanding that, the petitioner might have had some capital which was not "disposable capital." The Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, referred to the National Assistance Board the duties of determining a person's disposable income and disposable capital and the maximum amount of his contribution to the legal aid fund. The reason for that course is because officers of the National Assistance Board are accustomed to dealing with such matters. The Legal Aid Committee followed the advice of the National Assistance Board and, between them, they decided how much the petitioner who desired to bring his petition before the court should provide by way of contribution.

Within a very short time of that having been decided, and the petitioner having determined to pay that contribution, an application was made to the registrar by the wife (who also is an assisted person and who does not really need security for costs at all, because she is an assisted person) under rule 65. It is the duty of the registrar under that rule, after taking all the circumstances into account, including the means of the husband and the wife, to consider whether or not the husband should provide security and how much he should provide, if anything. The registrar has to consider all the circumstances including the means of both spouses. The registrar said: "I have referred to "the petitioner's legal aid certificate for particulars of the "petitioner's means and consider he is able to give security for "£20." It looks to me very much as though he considered that the petitioner was in a position to do something which the National Assistance Board thought they ought not to ask him to do. I recognize that the test which the registrar had to apply is not precisely the same as that which the National Assistance Board has to use; but it is the duty of the National Assistance Board, in a case such as this, to find out, having regard to the terms of the Act and the rules thereunder, how much is reasonable for the petitioner to pay when he is granted legal aid; and they do that. The registrar, who considered the matter very soon after the Board had made their assessment, said: "I have the "certificate before me and I consider that the husband is able "to give security for £20." That is akin to a registrar sitting on appeal from the National Assistance Board, and it is undesirable that such a position should arise.

Over and above that, the object of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, is to enable a party who has a case to put before the court, a case which is considered proper and worthy of assistance, but who has not the means to do so, to put his case forward with the help of the legal aid fund. In this case both sides have been granted legal aid. The application on behalf of the wife is: "Grant me security." It may be that the result of her application would be that one side which has legal aid would prevent the other side which also has legal aid from bringing his petition forward. It is not clear where the petitioner is to find the sum which the registrar ordered him to pay. Has he to borrow it, or has the petition to be held up for months, when it has been decided by the Legal Aid Committee that he has a proper case to bring forward? What good purpose does the order for security serve? I do not think that it serves any good purpose whatever. In the case of an application, such as this, made by a wife who is an assisted person, and when there is no reason to think that the husband has any means other than those which the National Assistance Board has found, I do not see what good an application for security can do to anyone when it follows immediately on the assessment of the husband's financial position by the National Assistance Board. It is a waste of time, and it is a waste of money. If there is any reason to think that there has been a change of circumstances since the Board made their assessment, or that something has been overlooked, the position is quite different; but that there should be an application of this kind without any materials put before the registrar except the civil aid certificate is difficult to understand.

v.

Further, if it had been right to make an order which would have preserved, I suppose, the right of the wife under rule 65, it clearly ought to have been a very small order and the cost of obtaining it would be more than it was worth. The Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, may be, and, I think, is, of great benefit, but it is important that it should be worked reasonably. This application has led to the incurring of considerable costs. It was an application which could be made without the leave of the committee. At a later stage the leave of the committee was necessary for the petitioner to appeal to this court. It was right that that leave should be given and, as the order had been made, it was right that it should be discussed in this court.

I do not question the power to make an order under rule 65, but as Barnard J. said in Vincent v. Vincent,[15] in referring the matter back to the registrar, "it may well be that he will "come to the conclusion that this is a case in which no security "should be ordered." That is the conclusion to which I think the registrar ought to have come in this case. It is for that reason that I think the application was a mistake. If all that is put before a registrar, in a case of this kind, is the civil aid certificate, I do not think that it is right for him to say: "I have "referred to the petitioner's legal aid certificate for particulars "of the petitioner's means and consider he is able to give "security for £20." If that is the true position, one would think that a further £20 might have been ordered by way of contribution from the husband towards his own costs. I do not think that it is desirable, in view of the circumstances which are before this court, that there should be an order of this kind made against the petitioner on no information other than that which was before the National Assistance Board.

For these reasons I have reached the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed and that the order for security made by the registrar should be set aside.

MORRIS L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion. It is of interest, when considering the circumstances in this case, to note some remarks made by my Lord in Wigley v. Wigley.[16] That was a case in which the wife was an assisted person, but the husband was not. My Lord said[17]: "But, if that assisted "person is a husband, and the suit is a matrimonial suit, it "may be that thereafter an application comes for security for "the wife's costs. It is with that sort of case in mind that I "think it might be as well if regulations under section 12 (2) "(b) (ii) were made. Otherwise, someone will be faced with

[17] [1951] P. 156, 160.

" the task of deciding what is to be done in regard to the wife's " application for security for costs when, with the help of the " National Assistance Board, the local committee have already " decided that the husband shall make the maximum payment " which he can make to the legal aid fund. There may be an " overlapping and it will be extraordinarily difficult for anyone " to say what shall be done unless further guidance be given on " that matter."

It is to be observed that by section 1 (7) (b) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, it is provided: " Save as expressly pro- " vided by this Part of this Act or by regulations made " thereunder— . . . (b) the rights conferred by this Part of this " Act on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or " liabilities of other parties to the proceedings or the principles " on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally " exercised."

The Matrimonial Causes Rules of 1950 were dated December 4, 1950, and were amended by the Matrimonial Causes Amendment Rules, 1951, dated May 9, 1951. The provisions of rule 65 are, therefore, provisions which are in force during the period subsequent to the passing of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. I can find nothing which supersedes, or which in any way nullifies, the present effect and validity of rule 65 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. Therefore, I find myself in agreement with the judgment which Barnard J. delivered in Vincent v. Vincent,[18] to which my Lord has referred. Barnard J. there pointed out that in Conway v. Wimpey (George) & Co. Ld.[19] this court was considering a situation to which order 58, r. 15 (2), applied, and it was from that rule that the expression " special " circumstances " came. It follows, therefore, that rule 65 is operative, and that the power to make an order for security under that rule remains and survives, even though the parties are assisted persons. But it is of great consequence to have in mind the concluding words used by Barnard J., to which my Lord has drawn special attention. They form a guide and are a pointer to the view which I think must have been held by the judge as to what is likely to happen in cases of this kind.

We were also referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Jackson v. John Dickinson & Co. (Bolton) Ld.[20] in which the plaintiff, who was ordinarily resident abroad, claimed, as an assisted person, damages for personal injuries. The defendants applied for an order for security for costs. It was held that the fact that the plaintiff was an assisted person did not disentitle the defendants from obtaining an order for security.

Mr. Kenneth Jones referred, in the course of his submissions, to the provisions of section 2 (2) (e) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act: " Where a person receives legal aid in connexion with any " proceedings . . . (e) his liability by virtue of an order for costs " made against him with respect to the proceedings shall not " exceed the amount (if any) which is a reasonable one for him " to pay having regard to all the circumstances, including the " means of all the parties and their conduct in connexion with " the dispute." Mr. Kenneth Jones quite correctly pointed out that that shows that though a party is an assisted person, if due regard is had to that fact and to all the circumstances, there may be an order for costs made against him. In the present case, the only material, we have been definitely told, which was before the registrar was the civil aid certificate. Mr. Kenneth Jones submitted that, in spite of the terms of that certificate, it might have been that the assisted person had some resources. He pointed, for example, to para. 6 of the second schedule of the Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations, 1950 (No. 1358), which reads: " No account shall be taken of any loose cash in the posses- " sion of the person concerned reasonably necessary to meet his " current requirements so far as it does not exceed £20." So, Mr. Kenneth Jones argued: " The husband may have had up " to £20," and he pointed to other contingencies or possibilities. It seems to me, however, that all that is pure speculation and that, in a case in which the only material before the registrar was what is contained in the civil aid certificate in this case, there was no material on which the registrar could make his order.

It might well be that the effect of that order would be to prevent the assisted person from proceeding with his petition. There is the usual stay pending the provision of security, but unless the petitioner could find the £20, he might never be able to proceed.

I agree fully with all that my Lord has said, and, on the facts of this case, it seems to me there was not sufficient material on which the registrar could make the order which he made. I concur with the order proposed by my Lord.

[1951 A. No. 1390.]

Factory—Steel foundry—Injurious dust—Elimination—Combination of grid and extractor plant—Provision of masks—Pneumoconiosis contracted by workman—Whether "practicable measures" taken for protection of employees—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 47 (1)—Grinding of Metals (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925 (S.R. & O. 1925, No. 904), reg. 13.

By section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937: "In every factory "in which . . . there is given off any dust . . . injurious . . . "to the persons employed . . . all practicable measures shall be "taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the "dust . . . and in particular, where the nature of the process "makes it practicable, exhaust appliances shall be provided. . . . "

From 1940 to 1948, except for two periods of time, the plaintiff was employed by the defendants in their steel foundry. Although it was not realized at the time, he had by 1943 contracted pneumoconiosis as a result of inhaling dust in the foundry, and by 1948 he was partially disabled. Before 1940 the defendants had installed grids and gratings in their foundry in an effort to eliminate dust, and in 1942 they installed an extractor plant underneath the gratings to draw off the dust, which resulted in a great improvement in the atmosphere of the foundry. At the time of its installation the combination of an extractor plant and gratings for the purpose of eliminating the danger from dust was new in the steel industry. The defendants also provided masks for their employees and endeavoured to induce them to wear them, but the plaintiff, although well aware of the danger, chose not to wear his while at work. In an action by the plaintiff claiming damages on the ground that his condition was caused and aggravated by negligence and/or breach of statutory duty by the defendants in that (among other things) they took no steps to safeguard him from the dust or to provide exhaust fans or appliances and were, in the circumstances, in breach of section 47 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937:—

Held, that the obligations imposed by section 47 (1) depended upon the meaning of the word "practicable"; that, although that word imposed a stricter standard than "reasonably practicable" it meant that the measures to be taken must be possible in the light of current knowledge and invention; that the method now perfected for eliminating the dust hazard in steel foundries was not known at the time when the plaintiff contracted pneumoconiosis and was, therefore, not practicable within the meaning of section 47 (1), and that, therefore, as the defendants had taken reasonable steps to induce their employees to wear masks, they could not be said to have been in breach of section 47 (1) or of their common law duty. The plaintiff, accordingly, was not entitled to succeed.

ACTION.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants at their steel foundry for about eight years. From July, 1940, until October,

1952

ADSETT v. K. AND L. STEEL-FOUNDERS AND ENGINEERS LD.

1944, except for a period of six months, he worked in and about a sandmill, preparing a sand mixture in a hopper and also shovelling sand through two-inch gratings on to a conveyor belt a few feet below. That was a dusty operation, for a considerable amount of dust rose up through the grating. From October, 1944, until September, 1945, the plaintiff was a foundry slinger, engaged in taking castings and moulds to gratings and grids where the castings were knocked out, a process which also caused a considerable amount of dust. In September, 1945, the plaintiff left the defendants' employment, but he returned in December, 1946, when, until April, 1948, he worked as a labourer in the shot blasting department, wheeling castings on a trolley into the sand or shot blasting cabinets. While blasting was in process the doors were closed and the shot-blaster alone remained in the cabinet, but occasionally dust would come as if from the cabinets although any dust which actually escaped from the cabinets was infinitesimal. When blasting was over the plaintiff went into the cabinets and removed the castings. From April, 1948, to October, 1948, he was a slinger for the shot-blaster, and it was part of his work to rough off surplus sand from the castings, and that, again, was very dusty work.

In November, 1943, when a general X-ray of all the defendants' workers was taken, nothing abnormal was noticed in the X-ray of the plaintiff. In October, 1948, the plaintiff left the defendants' employment. Further X-rays were taken, and he was found to be suffering from pneumoconiosis, which, in fact, he had contracted in 1943. Finally, in August, 1949, the plaintiff was certified by a pneumoconiosis board as suffering from that condition and awarded a 40 per cent. disability pension.

Pneumoconiosis is a progressive disease caused by inhalation of dust, in particular of dust caused by very fine particles of sand with a high silica content such as is used in steel foundries. The defendants were among the foremost in the steel industry to carry out research into methods of eliminating the dust hazard in steel foundries, and were the first to introduce grids or gratings to reduce the dust, and at the time when the plaintiff began working for them the current method was for castings to be knocked out on the sandy floor and not over a grid, which was a less dusty method. In 1942 the defendants installed an extractor plant underneath the grating which drew away the dust and effected a great improvement in the atmosphere of the foundry. At the time when it was installed the extractor plant was an innovation. Masks provided by the defendants were issued to all the men working in the foundry, and it was the custom of the foreman to tell all new employees that they must wear their masks. The plaintiff was supplied with a mask when he entered the defendants' employment, but although he was aware of the danger and throughout his employment possessed a mask, he was not in the habit of wearing it at his work.

ADSETT v. K. AND L. STEELFOUNDERS AND ENGINEERS LD.

The plaintiff brought this action for damages for personal injuries and physical harm against the defendants. He alleged that the pneumoconiosis from which he was suffering was caused and aggravated by negligence and/or breach of statutory duty by the defendants during the period when he was employed by them in that (among other things) they took no adequate steps to safeguard him against the danger of contracting pneumoconiosis and took no steps to provide fans or exhaust appliances, and were, in the circumstances, in breach of sections 4 and 47 (1)[1] of the Factories Act, 1937. He also alleged breach by the defendants of regulation 13 of the Grinding of Metals (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925.[2]

The defendants denied liability.

PARKER J. The plaintiff claims damages against his late employers for negligence or breach of statutory duty. Shortly, his case is that he was employed by the defendants in their steel foundry at Letchworth from 1940 to 1945, and again from the beginning of 1946 until October of 1948, and that throughout those periods he was working under very dusty conditions, and as a result contracted a condition of the lungs known by the generic name of pneumoconiosis. He claims that that condition resulted from a breach of the common law duty as between master and servant, or a breach of statutory duty under the Factories Act and regulations made thereunder, to take steps to prevent him being injured by dust.

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 47 (1): "In every factory in which, in connexion with any process carried on, there is given off any dust or fume or other impurity of such a character and to such extent as to be likely to be injurious or offensive to the persons employed, or any substantial quantity of dust of any kind, all practicable measures shall be taken to protect the persons employed against inhalation of the dust or fume or other impurity and to prevent its accumulating in any workroom, and in particular, where the nature of the process makes it practicable, exhaust appliances shall be provided and maintained, as near as possible to the point of origin of the dust or fume or other impurity, so as to prevent it entering the air of any workroom."

[2] Grinding of Metals (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925, reg. 13: "Sand blasting shall not be done in any room except in an enclosed chamber or cabinet in which no other work is ordinarily performed and at which efficient means are provided, arranged and maintained to prevent the escape of dust to the outside of such chamber or cabinet."

ADSETT v. K. AND L. STEELFOUNDERS AND ENGINEERS LD.

Parker J.

[His Lordship stated the facts as set out above, considered the medical evidence, and continued:] I have come to the conclusion that the balance of probabilities, despite the difficulties of the short exposure, are that the plaintiff had, by November, 1943, contracted pneumoconiosis of the lung. The question then is: was it contracted in the course of this employment? In my view it was. Indeed, if it is once held that he is suffering from the disease it is difficult to see how else he could have got it.

Then comes the question: if, as I have held, he suffers from this condition of pneumoconiosis, did he contract it as a result of any fault on the part of his employers? Before dealing with the specific allegations under that head, I think that it is right to make one or two general observations. First, it is inevitable that a steel foundry will produce considerable hazards from the point of view of pneumoconiosis. I am told that steel foundries in the country consume—if that is the right word—something like two million tons of sand in a year. That is sand with a very high silica content, and it is the inevitable result of the very operation of the foundry work that dusty conditions will prevail whatever care is taken. But, of course, it follows that, because of those hazards and because of those dusty conditions, employers must do all that they can to limit the hazard.

Recent research has shown that the dust which is dangerous from the point of view of pneumoconiosis is so fine that it cannot be seen—dust of the order of what is referred to as five to ten microns, a micron being a ten-thousandth part of a millimetre—and of that dangerous dust the most dangerous is that produced in the fettling shop of the foundry by the use of pneumatic chisels which cut the sand particles, and freshly broken particles of sand of that minute size are the most dangerous. It becomes clear at once that it is inevitable that throughout the atmosphere of a foundry there will be this very dangerous dust, and by its very layout it is impossible to divide a foundry off into small, as it were, watertight compartments where any dangerous dust can be isolated. A certain amount is bound to go into the atmosphere. The most dangerous place is the shot blasting cabinet, because there the sand is blasted off the castings by an operator using a hosepipe from which is shot out shot metal under a pressure of some 95 lbs. to the square inch, which itself breaks the sand particles and causes these dangerous freshly fractured particles. In regard to that regulations, to which I will refer, have been made, dealing with the construction and use of the cabinets in which shot blasting takes place because, unlike a lot of the other processes in the foundry, it is possible to isolate the dangerous dust produced.

I draw attention to those observations because this is one of the cases where it is not enough for a workman to say "I got "the disease during my period of employment." He must go further and satisfy the court that it was caused as a result of some breach by his employers of their common law or statutory duty, and that is all the more imperative when the very nature of the work is one which is subject to hazards which cannot be eliminated altogether.

One final observation; it is conceded by everybody in this case that the defendants have conducted considerable research into this matter. They have invented, and are continuing to invent, new methods of overcoming the hazards, and they are in the very front of the fight by the steel foundry industry in this country to eliminate these hazards.

The first ground which was relied on by the plaintiff was an alleged breach by the defendants of section 47 of the Factories Act, 1937. [His Lordship read section 47 (1) and continued:] It was said here that it was practicable at all material times to insert an exhaust appliance under the grid, as was in fact done in January, 1942. It was said that the installation of that plant did remove all dust; that extractor plants were not a modern invention; that they had been well known in use for certain purposes for a number of years; and that there was nothing physically impossible, by reason of the layout of the factory or the like, in its being installed. That brings me at once to what "practicable" means.

Mr. Croom-Johnson, who argued this case very well for the plaintiff, pointed out, what is undoubtedly true, that there are at least three different standards under the Factories Act, probably more. There is the standard which amounts to an absolute duty, which is imposed by a number of sections by means of various words, including, in one section, the words "effective measures." There are also at the other end of the scale obligations which are to be carried out where "reasonably "practicable"; that invokes at once a number of considerations apart from possibility, such as questions of cost, questions, probably, of practice and, indeed, as was said in the Court of Appeal in McCarthy v. Coldair Ld.,[7] probably comes close to, or is equivalent to, the ordinary common law obligation of master and servant. That, as I have said, is at the other end of the scale.

In the middle there is an obligation which, as here, is to do something if it is practicable, and presumably "practicable" is something stricter than "reasonably practicable." The real question is: "What does 'practicable' mean?" Mr. Croom-Johnson referred me to Webster's Dictionary, where "practic-"able" is defined as "possible to be accomplished with no "means or resources," and, although dealing with a different point, Lord Goddard C.J., in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings Ld.,[8] adopted a definition in the Oxford Dictionary of "capable of "being carried out in action" or "feasible."

It seems to me that "practicable" must impose a stricter standard than "reasonably practicable." Under "practicable"

ADSETT v. K. AND L. STEELFOUNDERS AND ENGINEERS LD.

Parker J.

questions of cost may be eliminated, but what is to be done must still be possible, and it must, as I see it, be possible in the light of current knowledge and invention at the time. The defendants' old method, and, I understand, the current method, of knocking out moulds was to knock them out on the sandy floor of the foundry, an operation which is extremely dusty, and the defendants introduced—and, so far as we know, were the first in the industry to introduce—grids or gratings with a view to eliminating the dust hazard, and, although the dust remains, that is an improvement on the knocking out on the sandy floor.

Then, in January, 1942—and but for the difficulties of obtaining machinery during the war I have no doubt they would have introduced it earlier—the defendants went still further by way of eliminating this hazard by introducing the extractor plant under the grid. It is true that there is nothing new in the nature of an invention in the form of a grid; nor is there anything new in the nature of an invention in the form of an extractor plant; but what was new, and what was not part of current knowledge and invention at the time, was the combination of a grid and an extractor plant for the purposes of eliminating the dust hazard produced by knocking out moulds.

I think myself that at that time, between 1940 and 1942, the method now perfected for eliminating the sand hazard was not known, and was not in my view practicable within the meaning of that word in section 47 of the Factories Act. One complaint was that before the installation of that plant steps ought to have been taken to protect the men, whether under section 47 or at common law matters not, by providing them with masks and taking all possible steps to see that they wore them.

[His Lordship considered the evidence relating to the provision of masks and continued:] There is no doubt that masks were available, and that the men knew that they were available. But, of course, the duty under the Act and, indeed, at common law, is so strict that it is not enough to say to a man "Oh, you can have a mask"; there is a duty to provide a mask, and if need be, to put it into his hand and to take such steps as you can to get him to wear it.

I am satisfied, without going through all the evidence on behalf of the defendants, first, that the plaintiff well knew the hazard, and secondly that he was supplied originally with a mask or masks. I am also satisfied that in 1942 he turned in his old mask and was reissued with two new masks. I am further satisfied that he chose, as, indeed, so many other people chose because it was uncomfortable, not to wear his mask.

As regards what steps were taken to see that the men wore the masks, I agree that the position is not quite so satisfactory. The position, as I see it, was that, although masks were the only practicable measure that could be taken to prevent people from inhaling this dust, they were, as all the witnesses have said, almost impossible to wear, at any rate for heavy work like shovelling, and although the ideal thing was to wear them there were comparatively few men who would do so. There is some evidence that steps were taken to induce the men to wear masks, but I think that the foremen soon gave up the hopeless task of trying to induce the men to do what was almost impossible for them to do, namely, to wear a mask for heavy shovelling. Indeed, one of the difficulties in the steel foundry is that the only measure that really can be taken to eliminate the hazard is to make the men wear masks, and until Parliament says so, or until—as I understand is being done now—a mask is invented which will enable men to work, talk and smoke with it on in comfort, men will not wear masks.

I have been referred to Clifford v. Challen (Charles H.) & Son,[9] which was concerned with the provision of barrier cream as a protection against dermatitis. I fully recognize all that was said there, but I think that somewhat different considerations apply to a mask in a case like this, in which all the evidence is that it is impossible to get people to wear it. I am satisfied that in this case the defendants did take reasonable steps to induce the men to wear masks. The foreman of the fettling shop said that his instructions were that labourers could obtain masks if they needed them. He would say to his foreman, "Look, you have a new man starting; do what you can to get "him to wear a respirator when there is any concentration of "dust." Then he said what I think is, and I accept as, a true attitude of those in authority at this foundry, "One of our "ambitions was to make men wear masks." Of course, you cannot do it until, as I have said, Parliament says that they are to be worn.

Although, therefore, I am satisfied that the plaintiff contracted pneumoconiosis by November, 1943, and that he contracted it as a result of exposure to dust during his work with the defendants, I am not satisfied that it was contracted as a result of any breach of statutory duty or common law duty by the defendants.

The matter does not quite end there, because it was said that there were subsequent breaches of duty during the remaining period of his employment as a result of which the fair inference was that the condition which existed in November, 1943, had been aggravated or had increased by November, 1948. As regards most of the complaints during that period, the only complaint can be the one already made with regard to the non-provision of masks: and everything I have said in regard to masks applies also to this period.

ADSETT v. K. AND L. STEEL-FOUNDERS AND ENGINEERS LD.

That leaves one complaint only. By regulation 13 of the Grinding of Metals (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925, it is provided that "Sand blasting shall not be done in any room "except in an enclosed chamber or cabinet in which no other "work is ordinarily performed and at which efficient means are "provided, arranged and maintained to prevent the escape of "dust to the outside of such chamber or cabinet." I think that as a matter of construction that clearly imposes an absolute duty on employers with regard to preventing an escape of dust from these cabinets.

I observe that the same view has been held in the recent case in the Court of Session of McCorkindale v. Lion Foundry Co. Ld.[10] That case is not binding on me, but I have read the observations and the conclusion arrived at, and I would have reached the conclusion at which I have arrived quite apart from that decision.

It was said here that dust did escape from these cabinets, and it was agreed that any dust which did escape was of the very highest dangerous category. It was said that that occurred in one or two ways. First, it was said that the doors were not kept properly sealed at the foot by a rubber hose, for it would wear out and was not renewed quickly enough, and when it got damaged or worn dust escaped from inside the cabinet. It was also said that on occasions the doors were not shut completely and the dust escaped. [His Lordship considered the evidence in regard to the cabinets and continued:] The amount of dust carried outside from inside would be really infinitesimal. I am satisfied that there were dusty conditions outside these doors, and although technically I suppose one grain of dust coming out would be said to be a breach of regulation 13, in this case these cabinets were so well sealed and maintained that any escape of that sort was really negligible. [His Lordship considered further complaints made by the plaintiff concerning the cabinets and continued:] I am not satisfied that the plaintiff was subjected to any hazard beyond the ordinary hazard of working in a foundry.

The difficulty I have in acceding to his argument on aggravation is that whatever development in his condition there was between November, 1943, and October, 1948, was very, very small. Pneumoconiosis is a progressive disease, and is one which will develop under the most careful foundry conditions. If in November, 1943, anybody had realized that the plaintiff was suffering from this condition they would have said "The one "place in which you must not work is a steel foundry," and therefore the working in the steel foundry—however properly conducted—would be bound to cause some increase of the condition.

[10] Unreported, April 5, 1952.

In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff has fallen far short of proving that he has suffered any aggravation, any development in the condition, as a result of any breach of duty on the part of these defendants.

In these circumstances this claim fails, and there must be judgment for the defendants.

Revenue—Income tax—Deduction—Expenses wholly and exclusively for purposes of trade — Advertising — To prevent nationalization of industry—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), Sch. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

Advertising expenses incurred by a company to prevent the nationalization of their industry are expenses wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade within the meaning of rule 3 (a) of Cases I and II of Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and admissible therefore as a deduction from the company's profits for the purposes of income tax.

Ward & Co. Ld. v. New Zealand Commissioners of Taxes [1923] A.C. 145; 39 T.L.R. 90 distinguished.

APPEAL by case stated from the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London.

The Commissioners held that a debt incurred by the respondents, Tate & Lyle Ld., for services rendered during a period of six months from March to September, 1949, was money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade under rule 3 (a) of Cases I and II of Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918,[1] and therefore admissible as a deduction from their profits for the purpose of income tax.

The debt in question was for expenses incurred by the respondents in a propaganda campaign against the Labour Party's proposals to nationalize the sugar refining industry.

The campaign originated in the intentions expressed by the government of the day in and before the year 1949, and in particular in a policy statement issued in April, 1949, which showed that it was part of the Labour Party's policy to transfer to public ownership all the sugar manufacturing and refining concerns in the country.

[1] Income Tax Act, 1918, Sch. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a): "In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of (a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade. . . ."

The respondents were the proprietors of an extensive business which among other activities refined more than half of all the sugar refined in this country. The board of directors regarded the Labour Party's policy as a threat to the company's existence, and decided to take such steps as might be open to them to resist it. At an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders held on September 15, 1949, the situation was reviewed and a resolution was passed expressing the belief that "nothing but harm "to workers, consumers and stockholders alike" could spring from nationalization of the industry, and empowering the board to "do everything in their power to meet the threat of the "nationalizers who . . . wish to seize the assets of this company."

In anticipation of this the respondents entered into an agreement with a firm known as Aims of Industry Ld., an independent company limited by guarantee. This agreement was dated March 31, 1949, and recited that the respondents were desirous of fostering and promoting the interests of the industry of sugar refining with the ultimate view to the preservation and extension of the goodwill of their business.

By clause 1 of the agreement the respondents appointed Aims of Industry Ld. their "public relations officer and advertising "agent" for a period of five years, determinable by three months' notice by the respondents. By clause 2, Aims of Industry Ld. agreed to "use its best endeavours to foster and "promote the interests of the said industry" by various advertising means. By clause 4 the agent's fee was fixed at £5,000 a year payable in advance, and by clause 5 the respondents agreed to lodge in a joint account a sum of £75,000 "for the purpose "of meeting all expenditure recommended by the company "[Aims of Industry Ld.] and approved by the principal for "furthering the aims and objects of this agreement."

During the first six months of the currency of this agreement the sum of £29,398 5s. 0d. was withdrawn from the joint account. Of this, according to figures in the case, £2,500 represented one half year's fee under the agreement, £11,500 odd represented "general advertising," and the balance of £15,339 15s. 2d. was stated to be due to "anti-nationalization expenditure (specific)." It was that last sum alone (or a sum to be substituted for it on any agreed redistribution of the £29,000 odd among the three heads mentioned) which was in dispute in the case. The Crown did not deny that sums expended in paying the fee of Aims of Industry Ld. under the agreement and the expense due to its general advertising activities were proper deductions; they contended, however, that expenditure on the so-called anti-nationalization campaign could not properly be deducted.

The commissioners decided as stated above, and the Crown now appealed from that decision.

1952. December 18. HARMAN J., reading his judgment:— The question on this appeal has a certain spurious interest derived from the fact that a political colour attended the activities on which the money in question was expended. These consisted of an advertising campaign whose object was to set the public mind against the then Government's proposal to nationalize the sugar refining industry. The standard bearer in the campaign was, it appears, an invented figure styled "Mr. Cube," whose antics and comments achieved notoriety because they appeared on the containers of sugar purchased weekly by consumers up and down the country and were, I suppose, applauded or execrated according to the political sentiments of the beholder. He became, according to the Solicitor-General, a well-known figure in political circles. This type of political flavour is bound to creep in where the state takes as large a part as it now does in the commercial activities of the country; but I desire to say at the outset that this case has nothing to do with politics or with the political feelings of those who were responsible for the activities in question; nor is it concerned with the views on nationalization of this or any other industry from time to time prevailing at Westminster. It is simply another instance of a familiar type of case where a taxpayer claims and the Crown denies the propriety of a deduction from profits under rule 3a of Cases I and II of Schedule D.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The first point taken for the Crown before the Commissioners was that this expenditure was concerned with the sugar refining industry as a whole and was not confined to the respondents' own concern. There is in my judgment nothing in this point. It was clear that a campaign of this sort could not be conducted in favour of one concern in the industry and that the only way to protect the respondents was to protect their competitors along with them. Therefore the fact that the whole industry was included did not make the money the less laid out exclusively for the purposes of the respondents' trade.

The second and third points taken for the Crown were based on the suggestion that there have been employed as a means to the so-called nationalization of industry two main methods, the first of which consists in the purchase of the assets of all the concerns in the trade, leaving them with nothing but Government stock to distribute among their shareholders: the second by acquiring the shares of all the shareholders in concerns interested in the trade, leaving the companies intact but entirely controlled by the Government or its nominee. It was apparently argued that if the first of these devices were employed the expenditure incurred in combating it was the cost of conducting a campaign to decide who should earn the profits, while if it was the second the expenditure was for the protection of the stockholders and not of the company's trade. This, in my judgment, is a false point. I cannot see that it makes any difference to a shareholder in a company which is to be nationalized whether he acquires the Government stock which is his compensation direct from a body which purchases his shares or indirectly on a liquidation of the company. In either event he ceases to have any interest in the industry. I cannot believe that this case turns on the question what form nationalization might have taken in the case of this industry.

Before me the point taken on the Crown's behalf was that this expenditure was expenditure connected with the ownership and not the conduct of the business, or alternatively, that the expenditure, even though laid out wholly for the purposes of the trade, was of a capital nature. This last point was not raised before the Commissioners, and it was urged upon me that the Crown ought not to be allowed to raise it now. For reasons which I shall give, I think that the point is a bad one, and I need not decide whether the Crown was at liberty to raise it here.

There are no disputed facts in the case. It must be taken as admitted or agreed that the expenditure in question was undertaken to prevent the confiscation of the business by means of nationalization. It is, I think, clear, and must have been clear to the Commissioners, that the general body of the shareholders who passed the resolution to which I have referred did not consider what form nationalization might take, and did not care. All that they wanted was to prevent the business from being taken from the hands of those then conducting it. The so-called campaign conducted by Aims of Industry Ld. in conjunction with the respondents had the same object; and I see no reason to suppose that the respondents through their board did not consider that it was, in the words of the resolution, intended to combat " the harm to workers, consumers and stockholders alike " believed to be likely to ensue from nationalization. Nor do I doubt that the objects of the campaign were considered to be within the recital in the agreement of March 31, 1949, as being " with the ultimate view to the preservation and extension of " the goodwill of the business."

Whether right or wrong, with these facts before them, the Commissioners found that the money was wholly laid out for the purposes of the respondents' trade, and the first question to be determined is whether that is a finding of fact; for, if it is, it seems to me that there was ample evidence before the Commissioners on which they could so find.

Before I consider this I will refer to the statute. The profits of the respondents are taxable under Sch. D (1) (ii) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and the rule in question is rule 3, which is in a negative form: " No sum shall be deducted in respect of " (a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly " and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the " trade." Scrutton J., in Smith v. The Incorporated Council of Law Reporting,[23] was of opinion that the question whether money was so laid out is a question of fact. Rowlatt J., however, in Union Cold Storage Co. v. Jones,[24] was of opinion that whether expenses were " too remote from the business of " the appellant company " was not a question of fact. Croom-Johnson J. in Cooke v. The Quick Shoe Repair Service,[25] was of opinion that if the expense was of a kind which could be included in the phrase then it was a question of fact whether it was so included. In this sense no one will doubt that the question is one of fact. It seems to me, however, that the question whether an expenditure whose object is known is capable upon the true construction of the Act of coming within its words must be a question of law, and for this I have the recent authority of Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Dowdall O'Mahoney & Co. Ld.[26]; see the speech of Lord Reid[27] and that of Lord Radcliffe[28] where he expresses the opinion that the Commissioners made an error of law in expressing an opinion analogous to that expressed here. It is therefore, in my opinion, for the court to consider whether, the facts being admitted, the expenditure upon a true construction of the rule is within it.

This rule has many times been before the courts and has been much glossed on by the judges who have had the difficult task of applying it to the multifarious circumstances occurring from time to time. In one of the earliest cases, Rhymney Iron Company v. Fowler,[29] Pollock B. deprecated the addition of a gloss, saying that the words themselves were sufficient. In that case he held that payments made to an indemnity fund were not within the rule. Notwithstanding this warning, attempts have been made ever since to illustrate the rule by way of gloss. The most celebrated is that of Lord Davey in Strong & Co. of Romsey Ld. v. Woodifield,[30] a case where the House of Lords declined to allow under this rule the deduction of a sum paid by a brewery company as damages for negligence of one of its servants. He said[31]: "These words . . . appear to me to mean for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade." Rowlatt J., in his judgment in The Union Cold Storage Company Ld. v. Jones,[32] said that the expenditure must be intended to "bring grist to the mill." Lord Porter in Smith's Potato Estates Ld. v. Bolland,[33] paraphrasing Lord Selborne in Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas,[34] said that the expense must be "incurred in order to earn gain." There are no doubt a number of other attempts to illustrate the rule. Perhaps the last word on the subject was contained in Lord Porter's speech in Smith's Potato Estates Ld. v. Bolland[35] where after a reference to Lord Davey's definition he said[36]: "These expressions of opinion given some forty years ago and accepted ever since are, in my view, inconsistent with the appellants' contention, but it is said they are at best dicta and are inconsistent with the principles" on which certain other cases are based. Then he said: "My Lords, this statement was obiter

" only, as the actual decision was merely that the expenditure " was capital expenditure and therefore not deductible, but the " language does require careful consideration." Then after dealing with that he went on to express the view that the words used in connexion with other trades and other circumstances, though they might be a good interpretation of the words for the purposes there in hand, had no necessary weight when applied to other and different circumstances. These are the words to which I am referring. After citing Strong & Co. of Romsey Ld. v. Woodifield [37] Lord Porter said [38]: " My Lords, that expression has often " been referred to and approved, but it was used in reference to " the circumstances of the case then under consideration and I " doubt if it carries the matter to a final conclusion. It still " leaves open the question what expense is incurred for the pur- " pose of enabling a trader to earn profits and the adoption of a " phrase helpful in analysing the meaning of words in an Act of " Parliament with reference to a particular set of circumstances " is not necessarily either useful or conclusive in all cases. It " is probably safer to retain the wording of the Act itself and, " by applying it to the facts established, to discover whether the " deduction falls within its terms or not."

This seems to me to be admirable counsel, and enjoins me to stick to the words " for the purposes of the trade." I have had a great number of cases cited to me which are no more than illustrations of various sets of circumstances under which the court held, or did not hold, that the expenditure came within the words, and I shall be excused if I do not refer to them, for I cannot think that what was decided in other circumstances can be of much help to me in these, which have not occurred before, and which for aught I know may never occur again.

Before grappling with this difficulty, I had better express my views about the point whether this was a capital expenditure. In my judgment, it clearly was not. Instances were cited to me where expenditure was held to be of a capital nature, for instance, Moore & Company v. Hare,[39] where a company promoted a bill to empower the building of a private railway. This seems a clear enough case: the new railway and the bill to promote it would produce a new asset of the company of a permanent nature. Similarly, in The City of London Corporation Ld. v. Styles [40] the performance of incompleted contracts as part of the price for taking over a business was clearly an expense designed to increase the permanent assets. So, too, in Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers Ld. v. Kerr,[41] the payment of £30,000 to obtain certain restrictive covenants from directors was held to be an attempt to add to the permanent value of the company's goodwill. The present seems to me to have been on ordinary accounting principles an income expense which would rank with other advertising expenses but for the singularity of its object. This point was considered by Lord Cave L.C. in his speech in British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ld. v. Atherton[42] in these terms[43]: "But there remains the question, which I have found "more difficult, whether, apart from the express prohibitions, "the sum in question is (in the words used by Lord Sumner in "Usher's Wiltshire Brewery Ld. v. Bruce[44]) a proper debit item "to be charged against incomings of the trade when computing "the profits of it; or, in other words, whether it is in substance "a revenue or a capital expenditure. This appears to me to be "a question of fact which is proper to be decided by the Com-"missioners upon the evidence brought before them in each case; "but where, as in the present case, there is no express finding "by the Commissioners upon the point, it must be determined "by the courts upon the materials which are available and with "due regard to the principles which have been laid down in the "authorities. Now, in Vallambrosa Rubber Company v. "Farmer,[45] Lord Dunedin, as Lord President of the Court of "Session, expressed the opinion that 'in a rough way' it was "'not a bad criterion of what is capital expenditure—as against "'what is income expenditure—to say that capital expenditure "'is a thing that is going to be spent once and for all, and "'income expenditure is a thing which is going to recur every "'year'; and no doubt this is often a material consideration. "But the criterion suggested is not, and was obviously not "intended by Lord Dunedin to be, a decisive one in every case; "for it is easy to imagine many cases in which a payment, "though made 'once and for all,' would be properly chargeable "against the receipts for the year. Instances of such payments "may be found in the gratuity of £1,500 paid to a reporter on "his retirement, which was the subject of the decision in "Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting,[46] and in the "expenditure of £4,994 in the purchase of an annuity for the "benefit of an actuary who had retired, which, in Hancock v. "General Reversionary and Investment Company,[47] was allowed, "and I think rightly allowed, to be deducted from profits. But "when an expenditure is made, not only once and for all, but "with a view to bringing into existence an asset or an advantage "for the enduring benefit of a trade, I think that there is very "good reason (in the absence of special circumstances leading to "an opposite conclusion) for treating such an expenditure as "properly attributable not to revenue but to capital." This expense has none of the characteristics of capital payments there adverted to and was, in my judgment, an income expense.

Turning now to the main difficulty, I may cite again from British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ld. v. Atherton,[48] where the Lord Chancellor said this in connexion with the deduction there in question[49]: "My Lords, I think it clear that the deduction from the profits of the above-mentioned sum of £31,784 "is not prohibited by the first rule applicable to Cases I and II, "which prohibits the deduction of a disbursement not being "money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the "purposes of the trade. It was made clear in the above cited "cases of Usher's Wiltshire Brewery Ld. v. Bruce[50] and "Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting[51] that a sum "of money expended, not of necessity and with a view to a direct "and immediate benefit to the trade, but voluntarily and on the "grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to "facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended "wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade; and it "appears to me that the findings of the Commissioners in the "present case bring the payment in question within that description. They found (in words which I have already quoted) that "the payment was made for the sound commercial purpose of "enabling the company to retain the services of existing and "future members of their staff and of increasing the efficiency "of the staff; and after referring to the contention of the Crown "that the sum of £31,784 was not money wholly and exclusively "laid out for the purposes of the trade under the rule above "referred to, they found that the deduction was admissible—"thus in effect, although not in terms, negativing the Crown's "contention."

It is urged by the respondents that those words of Lord Cave exactly cover what was done in this case. The respondents further relied on the decision of Mitchell v. Noble (B. W.) Ld.,[52] where the court allowed deduction of a sum paid to a retiring director in very peculiar circumstances described by Sargant L.J. in these terms[53]: "Now, first, as to the question whether this was "a disbursement wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for "the purposes of the trade, it seems to me that there is nothing "at all to show that it was not so exclusively laid out. The "object, as disclosed by paragraph 9 of the case, was that of "preserving the status and reputation of the company, which the "directors felt would be somewhat imperilled by the other "director remaining in the business or by a dismissal of him "against his will, involving proceedings by way of action in which "the good name of the company might suffer. To avoid that "and to preserve the status and dividend earning power of the "company seems to me a purpose which is well within the "ordinary purposes of the trade, profession or vocation of the "company."

It was the respondents' case that this sum of money was an income expense as in the last cited case, and not a capital expense as in British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ld. v. Atherton,[54] but was within the words used by Lord Cave and Sargant L.J. in describing an expense laid out wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade of the company.

The Crown relied particularly on a decision of the Privy Council, Ward & Co. v. The Commissioner of Taxes.[55] This case is the only one in which the circumstances bear any resemblance to the instant case. The expense there in question was incurred by a brewery company in financing a campaign to persuade the public to vote against "prohibition" in a forthcoming plebiscite. It is true that the result of prohibition would have been not to transfer the industry to the state but to destroy it altogether, but nevertheless there is a likeness between the two sets of circumstances, and the Court of Appeal in New Zealand and the Judicial Committee used phrases which at first sight at any rate are pertinent to the present case. I find this passage[56]: "The conclusion of the Court of Appeal upon this "point is contained in the following passage in the judgment of "that court: 'The question, therefore, is: Was the expenditure "'under consideration exclusively incurred in the production of "'the assessable income, for unless it was so, the Act expressly "'prohibits its deduction from such income. This question must, "'we think, be answered in the negative. We find it quite "'impossible to hold that the expenditure was incurred "'exclusively, or at all, in the production of the assessable "'income. It was incurred not for the production of income, but "'for the purpose of preventing the extinction of the business "'from which the income was derived, which is quite a different "'thing. It was contended by the company that it was illogical "'that while legitimate expenses incurred in the production of "'the income are deductible, similar expenses incurred for the "'much more important purpose of keeping the profit-making "'business alive are not deductible, and, further, that it was "'inequitable that the legislature should, on the one hand, force "'a certain class of traders into a struggle for their very "'existence, and, on the other hand, treat the reasonable "'expenses incurred in connexion with such struggle as part of "'the profits assessable to income tax. These aspects of the "'matter are clearly and forcibly set out in the contentions of "'the company as embodied in the correspondence with the "'Commissioner contained in the case, but they raise questions "'which can only be dealt with appropriately by the legislature.

" ' This court, however, cannot be influenced by such considera" ' tions, being concerned only with the interpretation and " ' application of the law as it stands.'

" Their Lordships agree with this reasoning. The expenditure " in question was not necessary for the production of profit, nor " was it in fact incurred for that purpose. It was a voluntary " expense incurred with a view to influencing public opinion " against taking a step which would have depreciated and partly " destroyed the profit-bearing thing. The expense may have " been wisely undertaken, and may properly find a place, either " in the balance sheet or in the profit-and-loss account of the " appellants; but this is not enough to take it out of the " prohibition in section 86 (1) (a), of the Act. For that purpose " it must have been incurred for the direct purpose of producing " profits. The conclusion may appear to bear hardly upon the " appellants; but, if so, a remedy must be found in an amend- " ment of the law, the terms of which are reasonably clear.

" It is only necessary to add that the decisions on the English " Income Tax Acts, the language of which is different from that " of the New Zealand Act, have no real bearing upon the question " now under decision."

It is to be observed that the board, which included Lord Cave, Lord Atkinson and Lord Sumner among its members, having had a number of English cases cited to it, was careful to say that the English decisions had no bearing on the question owing to the difference in language, the words of the New Zealand Act being " exclusively incurred in the production of the assessable " income," assessable meaning income to which the subject could be assessed to tax. The Board, moreover, stated that there the expenditure must have been incurred " for the direct purpose " of producing profits " and with this may be contrasted Lord Cave's statement in British Insulated and Helsby Cables v. Atherton[57] " in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of " the business." In my judgment, therefore, this case has no real bearing on the present one.

There remains the Crown's main contention, which was that the object of this campaign was not to maintain or increase the goodwill or profits, but to decide who should earn them. This, as it seems to me, covers too much ground. When analysed, it will be seen that all advertising is concerned with this struggle. If my goods do not appeal to the public and my competitor's do, he and not I will earn the profits which are to be made by selling the class of article which I have to offer. I therefore institute an advertising campaign with the object of belauding my goods and dispraising his: my design is that customers shall resort to my shop and not to his when they require the article in question. So here, the consumer is to be persuaded that he (or she) will get more or better or cheaper sugar by allowing the trade to be controlled by the respondents and their rivals than by entrusting it to the hands of the pundits in Whitehall. It is conceded that the expense of a campaign of the former sort would be allowable; and rightly, for the money is laid out for the purposes of the trade. Equally so, in my judgment, is money spent on the latter object. There was nothing to show that this campaign did not in fact increase the goodwill and reputation of the respondents in the eyes of the public, as it was intended to do.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that the Commissioners came to a right conclusion and I dismiss the appeal.

[1949 O. 166.]

Contract—Solicitor and client—Breach of duty—Negligence—Failure to advise client before death that his interest in certain property was entailed—Measure of damages—Time at which damages to be ascertained.

In 1941, the plaintiff, as guardian of her son M. then aged 18, engaged the defendants as solicitors to advise her on the extent and nature of his interest in certain settled property which had recently fallen into his possession. The defendants informed her that M. upon attaining 21 would become entitled absolutely to the property in question. In fact, M's interest in it was an equitable interest in tail male with remainder over in favour of his uncle.

In December, 1944, the plaintiff as agent for M. informed the defendants that he had attained 21 and that he was serving with the Royal Air Force in India. She requested the defendants to advise him whether any and what steps should be taken to transfer the settled property to him. At an interview and by a subsequent letter she was advised by the defendants that the transfer of the settled property could await the return of M. to England, and that this was the most convenient course to adopt. Subsequently she informed M. of the advice which had been tendered by the defendants.

On May 14, 1945, M. was killed in a flying accident in India. He died intestate and a bachelor and had not before his death executed a disentailing assurance, or will relating to the settled property, which accordingly passed to his uncle and did not fall into his estate.

After M.'s death it was discovered that the defendants had mistaken the nature of M.'s interest in the settled property.

The plaintiff as sole administratrix of M.'s estate brought an action for damages against the defendants, and claimed that they in breach of their duty to exercise care and skill as solicitors had (a) stated or implied that no steps need be taken by M. to make the settled property his own until his return to England, and (b) failed to advise M. that having attained 21, he ought to execute a disentailing assurance relating to the settled property or a will in accordance with section 176 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, if he wished to ensure that the settled property would form part of his estate on his death.

The plaintiff further claimed that in consequence of such negligence M.'s estate had suffered damage and had been decreased in value.

Held, that the defendants were guilty of a breach of contract, and that the damages which might fairly and reasonably be expected to flow from such breach were not limited to the nominal damages which the deceased could have recovered in his own lifetime; but were to be ascertained at the time when the damage accrued, that is, after the death of M.; and that as M. had been deprived of the opportunity of increasing his estate by making the settled property his own absolutely, the measure of damages was the loss to M.'s estate occasioned by the passing of the settled property to the next tenant in tail.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, as sole administratrix of the estate of her son Robert Colin Michael Otter ("Michael") who was killed on active service on May 14, 1945, intestate and a bachelor, brought an action for negligence against the defendants, who were solicitors. The plaintiff claimed that the defendants and in particular the partner Ralph Perceval Tatham, were negligent in that, in breach of their duty to exercise care and skill as solicitors, they failed to advise the plaintiff, acting as the agent of her son Michael, that his interest in certain settled property was an entailed interest and that Michael, having recently attained the age of 21, was in a position to disentail and make the property his own absolutely.

The plaintiff was the widow of Robert Edward Otter, barrister-at-law, sometime judge of the High Court in Burma, who died on October 14, 1932, leaving two children of the marriage surviving him, viz. Michael, who was born on September 18, 1923, and a daughter Jennifer.

Under the limitations of clause 13 of the will of one Catherine Elizabeth Younge, dated February 6, 1899, upon the death of one William Henry Otter in 1941, Michael, his father Robert E. Otter having died in 1932, became entitled in possession to certain freehold property ["the settled property"] for an equitable interest in tail male with remainders over.

Shortly after the death of William Henry Otter in 1941, the plaintiff retained and employed the defendants to advise her both on her own behalf and in her capacity as guardian of Michael in connexion with the settled property and with reference to the nature of his interest in it, and the defendants undertook to advise the plaintiff accordingly.

The defendants thereupon entered into correspondence with the solicitors to the estate of the testatrix, who, on August 21,

OTTER v. CHURCH, ADAMS, TATHAM & CO.

1941, wrote the following letter to the defendants and enclosed a copy of clause 13 of the will: " . . . In our view [Michael] " is entitled absolutely to the settled estates unless his father " who was tenant in tail barred the entail in his lifetime. If " Mr. Justice Otter did bar the entail then it seems to us the " settled estates would fall into the estate of Mr. Justice Otter " and the destination of the settled estates would be governed " by his will if he made a will.

" Please let us know:—

" (1) Whether you agree with our construction of the clause.

" (2) Whether Mr. Justice Otter did bar the entail. . . ."

On September 1, 1941, the defendants replied: " With " reference to your letter of the 21st ultimo, we have considered " same and we agree with your conclusions but, of course, we " have only seen an extract from the will and assume that there " is nothing else in the will affecting the question. If there is " any doubt about it then a short case might be put to counsel. " . . . The boy [Michael] will be 18 this month."

After further correspondence, in the course of which the defendants were supplied with a complete copy of the will of the testatrix, the defendants, on September 9, 1941, wrote the following letter to the plaintiff: " . . . I have had further letters " from [the solicitors to the estate of the testatrix] and I think " it is clear from the documents that they have sent me that " your son, on attaining 21, will be entitled to certain settled " property . . . " which was then set out.

In 1942, on leaving school, Michael joined the Royal Air Force. In 1943 he trained as a flying officer in South Africa, and later that year he was transferred to India where he performed navigational duties.

About the middle of December, 1944, the plaintiff informed the defendants (as the fact was) that Michael had attained 21 and that he was serving with the Royal Air Force in India. As agent for Michael she asked the defendants to advise Michael whether any and what steps should be taken to transfer the settled property to him, and by taking such action she impliedly retained and employed the defendants to advise generally concerning Michael's interest in the settled property. One Ralph P. Tatham, a partner, orally advised her that the transfer of the settled property could await the arrival of Michael in this country and that this course would be the most convenient one to adopt.

On December 27, 1944, the defendants wrote the following letter to the plaintiff: " I have heard from [the solicitors to " the estate of the testatrix] with reference to your son's legacy " and they agree that it will be better to wait until his return " to this country before the trust assets are transferred to " him . . . " Shortly after receipt of this letter the plaintiff wrote to Michael and informed him of its contents and effects.

OTTER v. CHURCH, ADAMS, TATHAM & CO.

On May 14, 1945, Michael was killed in a flying accident in India. He had not executed a disentailing assurance before his death; and accordingly, as he died intestate and a bachelor, the settled property passed to his uncle, Francis Lewis Otter, who survived him, and to his children under the terms of the will.

After the death of Michael the plaintiff, believing that the settled property formed part of his estate and devolved on her as his sole next of kin, was minded to make over the property to her daughter Jennifer. It was thought advisable to take the opinion of counsel, who pointed out that under the limitations of clause 13 of the will and in the events which had happened the property had passed to Francis Lewis Otter, and that accordingly the plaintiff's wishes could not be fulfilled.

By the amended statement of claim, the plaintiff claimed that in giving the oral advice at the interview in December, 1944, and in writing the letter dated December 27, 1944, the defendants acted negligently in the discharge of their duties to the plaintiff and Michael as their solicitors; that such negligence consisted in (a) stating or implying (as the letter in question did) that no steps need be taken by Michael to make the settled property his own until his return to England, and (b) the failure of the defendants to advise the plaintiff and Michael that, now that Michael had attained the age of 21, he ought to execute a disentailing assurance relating to the settled property or a will devising it in accordance with section 176 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, if he wished to ensure that the settled property would form part of his estate on his death.

The plaintiff further claimed that in consequence of such negligence on the part of the defendants (a) Michael refrained from executing a disentailing assurance relating to the settled property or devising it by will in accordance with section 176 of the Act of 1925, whereby it was lost to Michael and his estate, or, alternatively, that Michael was deprived of the opportunity of considering whether or not he should execute such a disentailing assurance or will . . . (d) the estate of Michael had suffered damage and been decreased in value.

The defendants by their defence denied the allegations contained in the statement of claim.

The value of the settled property was agreed for the purposes of the action to be £7,132.

UPJOHN J. [having stated the facts:] The law upon this matter may be summed up in one sentence which I take from the well-known passage in the speech of Lord Haldane L.C. in 1952

OTTER v. CHURCH, ADAMS, TATHAM & CO.

Upjohn J.

Nocton v. Ashburton (Lord) [1]: "My Lords, the solicitor contracts "with his client to be skilful and careful. For failure to perform "his obligation he may be made liable at law in contract or even "in tort, for negligence in breach of a duty imposed on him."

Mr. Tatham was neither skilful nor careful. He completely misread clause 13 of the will of Miss Younge. That was in a perfectly ordinary form, the effect of which should be known and understood by every solicitor and, indeed, by every student of law who has received instruction in the elementary law of real property.

The evidence may be summarized thus: in December, 1944, Michael having attained 21, acting through and by his mother as his agent—he, of course, being away on service for his country—consulted Mr. Tatham and asked for advice on what steps, if any, he should take to transfer to himself the settled estates. He was told that the matter was not urgent and that it could wait until his return. That was, I suppose, in the circumstances, as bad a piece of advice as any solicitor could give to his client. Mr. Tatham knew that Michael was engaged upon the dangerous occupation of flying during the war in the Royal Air Force. Mr. Tatham should have informed him that the property was entailed and that if he died on active service the estates would pass to his uncle and his uncle's children. He did no such thing. Michael was allowed to assume that the property belonged to him absolutely. He should have been told, of course, that it was possible to reduce the property into his own ownership, to make it his own, in one of two ways, either by making a will or by executing a disentailing assurance, in which case if he did either of these two things then, should he unhappily be killed on active service, the property would not pass to his uncle but would remain as part of his own estate.

It was argued that Mr. Tatham, having come to an admittedly erroneous conclusion on the true construction of the will in 1941, was under no liability to reconsider the matter in 1944. It was said that he owed no duty to Michael because, when he formed the erroneous conclusion in 1941, he was not acting for Michael; he was acting for Michael's mother in her capacity as guardian; and that, therefore, he was apparently entitled to assume that what he had considered in 1941 was correct and that he was entitled to give Michael advice on the basis that the opinion he had formed in 1941 was the true view. I reject that argument entirely.

When a solicitor undertakes to advise his client, in this case a young man who had just attained 21, and is specifically asked what steps, if any, his young client should take with regard to a specific piece of property, it is his duty fully to inform himself of the nature of the property with which the client is concerned. If, as in the present case, the solicitor prefers to rely on some information that he received in 1941, and if he chooses to rely on the erroneous views he then formed on the nature of his client's interest after he has perused the relevant documents, he cannot conceivably escape liability by saying that when he was originally considering the matter, he owed no duty to his client. His failure to advise his client properly was due to the fact that he advised him without properly informing himself of the nature of his client's interest.

In truth, as I did not see Mr. Tatham in the witness box, I do not know what he had in mind when he advised his client. His advice may have been given recklessly without pausing to consider what was the true nature of his client's interest. He may have refreshed his mind by looking at the earlier correspondence in 1941 before the interview with the plaintiff. He may, for all I know, have taken and kept a copy of clause 13 of the will, and he may have perused it again and again misconstrued it. All that is a matter of speculation, and it matters not what Mr. Tatham did. What is clear is that in advising his client, in the circumstances he acted neither skilfully nor carefully. He never told his client of the peculiar nature of an estate tail and its incidence.

In the result, I am satisfied and I find as a fact that Mr. Tatham was grossly negligent in the advice he tendered to his client through his mother, the plaintiff, in 1944, and that he was negligent both at the interview and in the letter he wrote to the plaintiff following upon that interview on December 27, 1944.

In principle, therefore, the plaintiff has established a breach of contract by the defendants, and the question arises what is the measure of damages. Mr. Ingress Bell submitted an attractive argument, which proceeded on these lines: he submitted that a personal representative can have no higher or better rights than the person he represents, and that, therefore, she can claim no greater damages than the deceased could have claimed in his own lifetime. It was then truly pointed out that damages in the deceased's lifetime must necessarily have been nominal, because the mistake having been discovered, it could be rectified at a stroke of the pen. Mr. Bell submitted forcibly that the plaintiff was, in effect, attempting to recover damages which resulted not from the solicitor's breach of duty, but which arose by virtue of the death of the deceased.

The matter is admittedly free from authority. Mr. Bell cited three cases: the first, Lockier v. Paterson,[2] was a decision dealing with the rights of a personal representative in an action of tort and does not really touch upon this point; the next, Valpy v. Oakeley,[3] again does not really touch upon the point I have to consider; and, finally, Beckham v. Drake,[4] contains a useful discussion of the general principles affecting this question.

Mr. Montgomery White, on the other hand, submitted that what vests in the personal representative is the right of action which was previously vested in the deceased; and he referred to Raymond v. Fitch,[5] where the judgment of Lord Abinger shows that, as a matter of common law, all choses in action which are not of a purely personal nature, such as an action for slander, survive and pass to the personal representative; and, indeed, that is not disputed.

"Accordingly," submitted Mr. Montgomery White, "the "right of action being vested in the personal representative, "what is the measure of damages?"; and he pointed out that the measure of damages must be such as might be expected naturally to flow from the breach. He submitted that that was the true test; and that it was not the right test to say that damages can be no greater than those which the deceased could have recovered in his own lifetime. He put his case, in a sentence, thus: there is the right of action in the personal representative. One has to ascertain the damages in accordance with principles affecting damages for breach of contract at the time that the damage accrues. I accept that submission.

What, then, is the proper measure of damages in the present case? I was referred by Mr. Bell to the well-known rule in Hadley v. Baxendale [6] as expounded in the more recent decision of Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ld. v. Newman Industries Ld., Coulson & Co. Ld. (Third Parties),[7] which established that damages for breach of contract should be such as would naturally be expected to flow from the breach, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. It seems to me impossible in this case to apply that latter test having regard to the nature of the breach of contract. Therefore, I have to consider what are the damages which may naturally be expected to flow from the breach.

It is perfectly true that if Michael had continued to live damages would have been nominal. Are they, however, to be limited to the damages which he could have recovered in his own lifetime, as Mr. Bell submitted? Not in my judgment. It is contrary to common sense to suppose that damages in a case such as this must only be nominal merely because, had the mistake been discovered in the lifetime of the deceased, it could have been rectified. The true method of approaching the problem, in my judgment, is this: if the mistake was discovered in Michael's lifetime it was his duty, of course, to mitigate damages, and, indeed, reduce them to a nominal sum by executing a disentailing deed; but it may well be that the mistake is not discovered until after his death. If the mistake is not discovered till after his death, Michael has been deprived of the opportunity of increasing his estate by executing a disentailing assurance relating to the settled property, and, therefore, upon his death, his estate is diminished by that amount.

To take one example only, suppose that the mistake had been discovered in the lifetime of Michael. He is informed of the mistake, and he is informed that he can do one of three things: he can let matters rest as they are, in which case upon his death without male issue the settled property will pass from him to another branch of the family; alternatively, he can execute a disentailing assurance and the property will become his; and in the further alternative he can execute a will making the property his own upon his death. Let it be assumed that, on being informed of that, he instantly sends an urgent message home: "Please send out for me a disentailing assurance. I "desire to reduce this property into my own ownership." A disentailing assurance is produced, but, unfortunately, before he can sign it, before it reaches him, he is killed instantly. Can it in those circumstances be seriously suggested for one moment that his personal representative is not entitled to sue for the diminution of his estate by reason of the solicitor's breach of duty? In my judgment, it cannot seriously be suggested that that is the law. In my judgment, therefore, I am not bound to hold that damages in this case are only nominal merely because the deceased could only have recovered nominal damages in his lifetime.

What, then, is the true measure of damages? The relevant facts upon that question seem to be these: it was certainly more than a remote possibility that Michael would be killed while on active service. The parties must, therefore, be taken to have considered that the result of this failure to give him proper advice might easily result in the loss of the estate. Mr. Bell submitted that, even upon the footing that he was wrong upon his first point, viz., that the personal representative could not claim greater damages than the deceased could have claimed in his own lifetime, even so damages are nominal. I reject that argument. In the circumstances of this case, there was a serious possibility that the failure to give him correct advice would lead to his estate losing the whole of the settled property.

Apart from that consideration, what are the other relevant circumstances? They seem to me to be these: this was not what I may call the Otter mansion. Had it been, one can imagine that Michael might well have wished it to descend to his uncle and male relations on his father's side rather than that he should bring it into possession for the benefit even of his mother and his sister; but, of course, this was no more than a piece of property which, so far as he was concerned, was worth about £7,000 and which was bringing to him an appropriate income. Therefore, that consideration makes it perhaps rather unlikely that he would have thought it right to allow the property to devolve on his uncle and cousins. On the other hand, I must bear in mind that he might have taken that view.

OTTER v. CHURCH, ADAMS, TATHAM & CO.

On the other hand, had the plaintiff been informed that a disentailing assurance or a will was necessary to preserve the property for her family—that is to say, herself and her daughter—she would undoubtedly, according to her evidence, which I believe, have advised her son to make a will leaving everything to his sister Jennifer; that is to say, that in law she would have advised her son to make the property his own; and I see no reason to doubt that the son would have probably acted upon his mother's advice; but, there again, he might not and I must bear that possibility always in mind.

There is also this further consideration: the settled property was worth at his death some £7,132. That is an income-bearing property and that would have borne income over the last seven years since his death, income not on quite £7,132, because of the incidence of estate duty, but, nevertheless, the value of the property which his estate has lost is substantially in excess of £7,000.

Bearing all those factors in mind, what is my duty? It is difficult, of course, to estimate damages when one has to speculate upon the action which Michael would have taken had he known the truth, but that difficulty is not a bar to this court assessing damages. That has been so ever since the well-known decision in Chaplin v. Hicks.[8]

I have to make up my mind as best I can, and I do so by awarding the plaintiff in her capacity as the administratrix of Michael £6,500.

Landlord and Tenant—Leasehold property—Expiring tenancy—New lease—Business of builder and decorator—Shop—"Retail trade or "business"—Shops Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 28), s. 74 (1)—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (14 & 15 Geo. 6, c. 38), s. 10 (1) and (2); s. 20.

The plaintiffs, a firm of builders and decorators, whose lease of premises was due to expire on December 25, 1952, applied to the county court judge for, and were granted, a new lease, under section 10 of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, on the ground that the premises were a shop, occupied wholly or mainly for the purpose of a retail trade or business, within the meaning of the Act. On appeal by the defendant landlords:—

Held, that the word "shop" as defined by section 20 of the Act of 1951 and section 74 of the Shops Act, 1950, did not cover the business of builders and decorators as carried on by the plaintiffs, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Per Somervell L.J. The history of the statutes dealing with shops, which are now consolidated in the Act of 1950, supports the view that the words "retail trade or business" are not capable of the wide construction sought to be put on them by the plaintiffs. I am clear that the words ought not to be construed as bringing in a business such as is carried on by the plaintiffs.

Per Jenkins L.J. Subsection (2) of section 10 of the Act of 1951 shows that the statute contemplates that the retail trade or business, by virtue of which the shop qualifies under the definition, will be carried on in the shop. If the expression "retail trade or "business" covered services rendered by a builder on the customer's own premises or on a building site, it would have been unnecessary to treat as doubtful cases requiring inclusion by definition, the business of a barber or hairdresser, the sale of refreshments, etc., for all would be covered by the phrase itself. A business might be a retail business although it was concerned with matters other than the sale of goods, but the designation "retail" seems to me to be wholly alien to the business of a builder and decorator.

Per Hodson L.J. The word "retail" primarily suggests the sale of goods rather than of services, and when it is sought to apply the word to the sale of services one is, I think, bound to consider whether the services are carried out on the premises, as, for example, in the case of a barber, or away from the premises as in the present case. That, I think, is a valid distinction in considering the word "retail," and it is supported by Lord Thankerton in Toogood & Sons v. Green [1932] A.C. 663, at p. 674; 48 T.L.R. 463.

APPEAL from Judge Blagden, Westminster County Court.

The plaintiffs, M. & F. Frawley Ld., builders and decorators, were the tenants of No. 21, Lawrence Place, New Oxford Street, W.C.1, and their lease was due to expire on December 25, 1952. They therefore, on October 8, 1952, applied to Judge Blagden for a renewal of the lease under section 10 of the Leasehold Property

(Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951.[1] The judge granted the application, holding that the premises were a "shop" and that the plaintiffs were carrying on a "retail trade or business" within the meaning of section 20 of the Act of 1951 and section 74 of the Shops Act, 1950.[1]

At all material times the plaintiffs had exhibited on the premises the notice "Builders' materials supplied by retail," and over the entrance door there was placed a large key and the notice "Keys cut," but it was not suggested that the sale of building materials to the public was a substantial or appreciable part of the plaintiffs' business.

The defendants now appealed, contending that the premises were not a shop and were not occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business.

SOMERVELL L.J. This is an appeal from a decision of Judge Blagden. The application was made by Messrs. Frawley under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, section 10 of which provides that the occupier of a shop may "apply to "the court for, and subject to the provisions of this Act . . . "obtain, the grant of a new tenancy," subject to certain conditions. The plaintiffs maintain that they were within that provision. The only answer with which we are concerned is that the premises

(2) "This section applies to a tenancy "the subject of which—(a) consists "of a shop, or (b) consists of a "shop and of living accommodation "occupied wholly or mainly by the "tenant or by a person who is "employed by the tenant for the "purposes of the retail trade or "business carried on in the shop."

Section 20: "(1) In this Act the "following expressions have the "meanings hereby assigned to them "respectively, that is to say:—. . . "'retail trade or business' has the "same meaning as in the Shops Act, "1950, except that it does not include "the sale of intoxicating liquor for "consumption on the premises, . . ."

"'Shop' means premises occupied "wholly for business purposes, and "so occupied wholly or mainly for "the purposes of a retail trade or "business."

Shops Act, 1950, s. 74: "(1) In "this Act, save where the context "otherwise requires—. . . 'retail trade "or business' includes the business "of a barber or hairdresser, the "sale of refreshments or intoxicating "liquors, the business of lending "books or periodicals when carried "on for purposes of gain, and retail "sales by auction, but does not "include the sale of programmes and "catalogues and other similar sales "at theatres and places of amuse-"ment."

were not a shop. Before going into the facts I will read the relevant definitions. [His Lordship read the definitions of "shop" and "retail trade or business" in section 20 of the Act of 1951 and continued:] The judge had a "view," which we have not had the advantage of having, but he set out very clearly the nature of the premises and the business of the plaintiffs. They have at all material times had a notice up "Builders' materials supplied by retail." Over the door there is a key and the words "Keys cut." Entering the premises, there is a small room where there are pots of paint and packets of cement, and paint brushes. They were available for sale to the general public. There is no counter, but the goods are displayed on a table and in a cupboard under the table. Then there are doors marked "office," and the rest of the premises is not open to the public and is very much greater in area. Those non-public rooms could fairly be described as offices, though a certain amount of material is kept there and work is done in one of them in cutting keys. In the basement, bulkier materials are stored. The plaintiffs are, and are described on their notepaper, as the judge found, as builders and decorators. Apart from cutting keys, they also do plumbing and electricians' work and some sign writing. They have been there for about 17 years.

It is not suggested on the part of the plaintiffs that this business of selling building materials to the public is a substantial or appreciable part of the business done by them. That is to say, if the issue whether this was a shop or not depended on this activity, it could not be said that these premises were used wholly or mainly for that particular trading activity. The judge has decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to be granted a new lease on the ground that the business carried on by them as builders and decorators was within the words of the definition of shop. The case, therefore, turns on the construction of those words.

The definition in the Shops Act, 1950, of "retail trade or business" takes the form of saying that the words to be defined "include" certain matters which follow. It was suggested, in the course of the argument, that "include" is normally used when something is to be included which manifestly would be outside the words to be defined but for the definition. I do not myself accept that view, nor do I wish to lay down any general observation as to what the word "include" may mean in every context. But in this context I think that it is plain that what follows "includes" are activities about which, at any rate, there might have been disputes whether they came within the words "retail trade or business." Undoubtedly, the word "retail," which governs the two words which follow, does primarily suggest the selling of goods rather than the selling of services.

In the course of the argument in the court below, and before us, a very wide construction of this phrase was put forward on these lines. It was said, rightly, that the word "business" in

1952
M. & F. FRAWLEY LD. v. THE VE-RI-BEST CO. LD.
Somervell L.J.

a certain context is a word of very wide import, possibly covering almost every activity for profit or gain. Then it was said, though I do not agree with this, that the word "retail" means any business activity in which the person carrying it on comes in contact with, and supplies services or other facilities to, members of the public as distinct from persons in trade. Then it was said that those two things ought to be, as it were, read into this tripartite expression "retail trade or business." The judge considered that argument, and he himself pointed out that that appeared to cover things which would, at any rate, seem to be a very long way away from the word with which one starts, which is "shop." The general character of the word to be defined must colour the definition. So far as I can see, this wide construction would include bankers. I need not, however, pause to consider how far it would go, because it is plain to me that if in their context the words "retail trade or business" were to be given a construction of that kind, then the definition in the Shops Act of 1950 was wholly unnecessary and would be an absurd provision.

We were referred to the history of the matter, and it has been explained how the barber came to be included as a "shop" and how the expression "retail trade or business" came to appear in the statutes which have dealt with shops and which are now consolidated in the Act of 1950. I do not find it necessary to refer in detail to those matters, but I think that the history supports the argument that these words are not capable of the wide construction which has been suggested. It seems to me that if the word "business" is to be regarded as extending the meaning beyond the buying and selling of goods, the extension (and we have examples in the definition) is of this kind. There are cases, and the barber is a very good example, where although no chattel may be sold services are sought and received at premises which are normally and naturally described as a shop. The same would apply, probably, to the business of lending books. But a builder and decorator seems to me to be in a different category altogether. His services are rendered normally outside his own premises.

The judge, at the conclusion of his judgment, gave as an example waterpipes bursting in somebody's house and someone being sent to the builder's premises in order that workmen may come to the house and repair the waterpipes. In my view, one is there in a different area to the shop, either according to the narrow definition, or according to the somewhat extended purview which is brought out by the definition in the Shops Act, 1950. It is unnecessary in this case to decide whether the word "business" in the Act of 1951 would bring in other activities than those which are brought in by the express words after "includes" in the Act of 1950. I am myself clear that they ought not to be construed as bringing in a business such as that carried on by the plaintiffs. I think that the judge felt the difficulties of the argument but, with respect, for the reasons which I have given, I have come to a different conclusion and I would allow the appeal.

Jenkins L.J. I agree. The plaintiffs, M. & F. Frawley, Ld., applied under section 10 of the Act of 1951 for, and were granted by the county court judge, a new tenancy of the premises here in question. The contest in the case is whether, as the judge held, the premises were a "shop" within the meaning of the Act. The definition of "shop" is to be found in section 20 of the Act, "'shop' means premises occupied wholly for business "purposes, and so occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes "of a retail trade or business." It is provided by the same section that "'retail trade or business' has the same meaning "as in the Shops Act, 1950," which, by section 74, defines "retail trade or business" in these terms: "'retail trade or "'business' includes the business of a barber or hairdresser, the "sale of refreshments or intoxicating liquors, the business of "lending books or periodicals when carried on for purposes of "gain, and retail sales by auction, but does not include the sale "of programmes and catalogues and other similar sales at "theatres and places of amusement."

It is, perhaps, worth noting that in subsection (2) of section 10 of the Act of 1951 there is this provision: "This section applies "to a tenancy the subject of which—(a) consists of a shop, or "(b) consists of a shop and of living accommodation occupied "wholly or mainly by the tenant or by a person who is employed "by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business "carried on in the shop." That provision, I think, is perhaps indirectly relevant as showing that the Act contemplates that the retail trade or business, by virtue of which the shop qualifies as such under the definition, will be carried on in the shop. My Lord has already referred to the facts found by the judge, which come very shortly to this: the plaintiff's business is that of builders and decorators. In the premises in question there is an outer room where pots of paint or size, or packets of cement, paint brushes, and the like, are available for sale to the general public. They also advertise themselves as key cutters and locksmiths. So far as the sale to the public of pots of paint, and so forth, is concerned, the judge found—and this was clearly in accordance with the evidence—that that part of the plaintiffs' activities formed an insignificant proportion of the business carried on on the premises, and that the main part of the business consisted in conducting from those premises the business of builders and decorators, receiving orders for building work, and giving estimates for building work, or tendering to undertake building work, to be carried on on the site, wherever it might be, where such work was required.

M. & F. FRAWLEY LD. v. THE VE-RI-BEST CO. LD.
Jenkins L.J.

Accordingly, in view of the insignificant character of the trade done in the way of the sale of paint, and so forth, the issue in this appeal resolves itself into the very short question whether, on the true construction of the Act of 1951, the carrying on in the way I have indicated of a builders' and decorators' business, which consists of doing building and decorating work on sites or in houses wherever the services of the plaintiffs are required, is the carrying on of a "retail trade or business" within the meaning of the definition. The expression "retail trade," I think, clearly connotes in its primary sense a business consisting of selling goods to members of the public (as distinct from members of the trade) who resort to the shop or premises where the business is carried on, for the purpose of making purchases. The expression "business" may, I think, have a wider connotation than the expression "trade," the latter expression being more closely linked with transactions of purchase and sale than the expression "business." The point is a very short one, and in my view the judge erred in holding that the builders and decorators' business here in question was a retail business because it involved doing work for the actual customer on the actual customer's property as distinct, I suppose, from doing work for some middle man other than the individual who actually required the services for himself. So to hold, in my view, involves placing a wider meaning on the expression "retail trade "or business" than it will reasonably bear.

I think that conclusion is borne out by the definition in section 74 of the Shops Act, 1950, for if the expression "retail "trade or business" had the wide significance sought to be placed upon it by the plaintiffs in this case, it would not have been necessary to treat as doubtful cases, requiring inclusion by definition, the business of a barber or hairdresser, the sale of refreshments, the business of lending books, and the business of retail sales by auction; for all these would be included in the phrase itself without any express extension of the definition. The terms of the definition do no doubt suggest, and for my part I would not deny, that a business may be a retail business although it is concerned with matters other than the sale of goods; but while I have no intention of attempting to lay down any general or exhaustive definition, it does seem to me that the adjective "retail," which is primarily applicable to the sale of goods in the way I have mentioned, demands in its application, as it were by analogy, to businesses which consist in the sale of services rather than goods, that the services rendered should be performed in circumstances comparable to those in which the ordinary retail trade, in the sale of goods, is normally carried on in a retail shop. For example, the business carried on in a shop where services, such as repairing shoes, or cleaning clothes or mending watches, are rendered for customers resorting to the premises in circumstances comparable to those in which the business of selling goods by retail to similar customers might be carried on, could, I think, reasonably be held to answer the description of a "retail business."

But the designation "retail" seems to me to be wholly alien to the builders and decorators' business here in question. We have been referred to a number of authorities on other Acts, but I do not find it necessary to take up time by reading them. There is nothing in any of them, so far as I am aware, in any way inconsistent with the conclusion at which I have arrived on the construction of the language of this particular Act and its application to the judge's findings of fact. Accordingly, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Hodson L.J. I agree. The word "retail" does primarily suggest the sale of goods rather than services, and when one seeks to apply the word "retail" to the sale of services one is, I think, bound to consider whether the services are carried out on the premises as, for example, in the case of a barber, or away from the premises as is the present case. The judge seems to have thought that that was a distinction without a difference. At the conclusion of his judgment, when discussing a case cited to him, Ritz Cleaners Ld. v. West Middlesex Assessment Committee,[2] a case on another Act, he noted that counsel had sought to distinguish that case on the ground that there business was carried on wholly at the dealer's premises and in this case it was carried on mainly at the customer's premises. That, I think, is a valid distinction in considering the word "retail," and it is supported by Lord Thankerton in Toogood & Sons Ld. v. Green,[3] where he himself quoted a speech by Lord Dunedin in a previous case, Turpin v. Middlesbrough Assessment Committee.[4] That was a case under the particular derating Act which was there in question with regard to a retail shop. Speaking of the garage premises, he said: "Now, if we compare the hereditament here "in question with a retail shop, do we find any common charac- "teristics? My Lords, I think we do; for they are both buildings "to which the public can resort for the purpose of having "particular wants supplied and services rendered therein." I think that supports the distinction which counsel has sought to draw and which is, I think, a valid distinction. For these reasons, and the reasons which my Lords have given, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

In May, 1932, after litigation, the court made a winding-up order and appointed a liquidator who rejected the company's proof for its amount and also the proof of a Russian barrister, who had lived for many years in England and had helped very greatly in the litigation, for £850 for his work: the liquidator, however, considered that sum fair and reasonable should the claim be sustained. Appeals against the rejections were dismissed by Vaisey J. in In re Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) [1952] W.N. 151; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 739; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1269. On an application to the registrar to sanction an ex gratia payment of £420, the registrar decided that the application was premature and that the proper course was to ascertain the views of the creditors. The application to sanction the payment thereupon came before Vaisey J.

Held, granting the application, (1) that the court, while it would in normal circumstances have upheld the registrar's decision, was dealing with a personal problem; (2) that the Russian barrister had been of great assistance in the winding-up and that, but for him, the matter might never have progressed; (3) that it was beyond question that his help might be of value in the future, as it had been to the liquidator in the past; (4) that the court was justified, in this particular case, in allowing the payment, provided that it was not going to be made the basis of future claims for ex gratia or other payments; (5) that, accordingly, on the Russian barrister's undertaking in writing to continue on the committee of inspection, unless prevented by ill-health or other unavoidable cause or until released from further service by the court, the court would authorize the liquidator to pay to him £420 as an ex gratia payment, in full satisfaction of all his claims for remuneration or compensation or expenses to the date of the court's order.

APPLICATION BY LIQUIDATOR.

On or about December 14, 1917, a Russian bank which was situate in Russia and had no address in England was dissolved by Soviet confiscatory decrees and ceased to exist. It was at the time indebted to an English company and, after litigation in England, a winding-up order was made in England, and a liquidator appointed, on May 30, 1932. In the winding-up the company proved for the amounts owing to it, and a Russian barrister of many years' standing and long resident in England, who had been of great assistance in the litigation, proved for £850 for his services, to which amount he claimed to be entitled as of right. The liquidator rejected the proofs of both the company and the Russian barrister, but regarded the amount of £850 claimed by the latter as fair and reasonable if the claim could be sustained. On February 28, 1952, Vaisey J., in In re Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky),[1] dismissed both appeals against rejection. The grounds on which that of the Russian barrister was dismissed were that his services had not been rendered to the bank, or to the liquidator, or to those interested in any equity in the bank, or to the Crown (in whom any assets in England of the bank would have vested as bona vacantia); and that to extend the principle of "agency of "necessity" to include agency on behalf of a non-existent person such as the bank would have been against the trend of decided cases. His Lordship suggested that the matter of a gratuitous payment be dealt with by the registrar who, accordingly, was asked to sanction the payment to the Russian barrister of £420 as an ex gratia payment in respect of his claim. The registrar considered that that application to him was premature, and that the proper course was to await the attitude of the creditors. The application for leave to pay the £420 thereupon came before Vaisey J.

Raymond Walton for the liquidator

VAISEY J. This is an application by the liquidator in the winding-up of the Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky) for leave to pay to Mr. Marc Wilenkin the sum of £420, or such other sum as this court should direct as and by way of an ex gratia payment in respect of his claim, as set out in his proof of debt sworn more than 20 years ago, on September 23, 1932.

The facts on which this application is based are sufficiently set out in the judgment which I delivered with regard to Mr. Wilenkin's legal claims and other matters, on February 28, 1952, and I need not repeat or enlarge on what I there said, observing only that Mr. Wilenkin's claim to have his proof admitted was rejected by me and that the liquidator was satisfied that if it came to a matter of gratuitous payment the sum of £850 would not be incommensurate with the services rendered for which the claim was put forward.

Of course, had I admitted Mr. Wilenkin's proof he would have had to come in with the other creditors and would have had to wait until the time had arrived for a distribution among them. It is anticipated that the amount which the creditors are likely to receive is something in the nature of ten shillings in the pound.

At the hearing before me last February I suggested that, if it was a case of gratuitous payment, it should be dealt with by the registrar, and Mr. Registrar Wilson very ably discharged his duty in dealing with this matter. When asked to sanction the payment which I am now asked to sanction, he expressed the view, which I think was well founded, as a matter of propriety, that the application was premature, being in substance an application to pay approximately 50 per cent. of the £850, not as of right but by way of gratuitous payment. The registrar expressed the view that the proper course would be to wait and see what the creditors thought because, after all, the proof had been rejected and it was their money which was to be depleted for the purpose of making this proposed ex gratia payment.

I agree with, and I think that, in normal circumstances, I should have upheld, the registrar's decision, but it does seem to me that here we are dealing in a sense with a personal problem. Mr. Wilenkin, who was called to the Russian Bar, or who became qualified as an advocate in Russia, many, many years ago, has undoubtedly been of great assistance in this winding-up and, indeed, but for his activities it is suggested that this matter would never have progressed at all; he laid the foundation for it. However, I am looking not only at the past. It must be remembered that the liquidator has told me that he thinks that £850 was a fair rate, and I have also to look to the future. I have to realize, and I think it is beyond question, that Mr. Wilenkin's help may be of value in the future as it has been of value to the liquidator in the past. I think that if this is not going to be made (and I do not intend it to be made) the basis for future claims—for ex gratia or other payments—that I am justified, in this case, in allowing this payment to be made. But I think that I shall allow it only on Mr. Wilenkin's undertaking to continue to serve as a member of the committee of inspection, unless prevented by ill-health or other unavoidable cause, or until he is excused further service by the court. I think that an undertaking of that kind will secure to the liquidator, so far as it is possible to secure anything in the nature of a contract of personal service, the continuance of Mr. Wilenkin's valuable assistance.

On that undertaking being given to the court, and it is an undertaking which I am quite sure that Mr. Wilenkin will observe not only in the letter but in the spirit, I will authorize the liquidator to pay to Mr. Wilenkin the sum of £420, which he claims by way of an ex gratia payment, such payment to be made on Mr. Wilenkin's receipt in writing acknowledging the payment to have been made in full satisfaction of all his claims for remuneration or compensation or expenses in connexion with the liquidation down to the present date. If a receipt is signed by him in that form, and if he gives an undertaking in the way in which I have suggested, I will authorize the payment to be made and the liquidator's costs will be his costs in the winding-up.

[Mr. Walton stated that he had been informed that Mr. Wilenkin would give the written undertaking and that he (counsel) had been asked to give verbally forthwith on Mr. Wilenkin's behalf the undertaking in the terms required by the court.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance order—Construction—Consent order—Jurisdiction of court—Validity of order—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49), s. 190 (1) (2).

A maintenance order drawn up by consent provided that the respondent husband should pay to the wife "until remarriage as "from . . . March 23, 1936, maintenance . . . of £300 0s. 0d. per "annum gross . . . monthly." The husband died, and his executors refused to pay further maintenance to the wife, who thereupon issued a summons applying for leave to issue execution against the husband's estate or, alternatively, against his executors. On appeal from Barnard J. (who upheld the registrar in dismissing the summons):—

Held, that the parties could not by consent confer on the court a jurisdiction which it did not possess, and inasmuch as the jurisdiction of the court in respect of a wife's maintenance was by section 190 (1) and (2) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, limited to a period of the joint lives, if the order was to be enforceable as an order of the Divorce Court it could only be for their joint lives. There was nothing in the order which, on construction, indicated to the contrary, and it should therefore be construed as limited to joint lives.

Decision of Barnard J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Barnard J. (sitting in chambers).

On March 23, 1936, the petitioner, Eunice Olwen Hinde, was granted a decree absolute against the respondent, Walter Stanley Hinde, in the suit which she had instituted.

The petitioner applied for maintenance and the solicitors for the parties appeared before the registrar. On March 25, 1936, a maintenance order was made by consent. By that order:

HINDE v. HINDE AND ANOTHER.

"Upon hearing the solicitors for the parties and by consent I do "order that Walter Stanley Hinde the respondent do pay or "cause to be paid to Eunice Olwen Hinde the petitioner until "remarriage as from the date of the decree absolute herein to "wit March 23, 1936, maintenance at and after the rate of £300 "per annum gross the said sum to be payable monthly and to "pay maintenance for Eleanor Margaret Hinde the child of the "marriage as follows:—(a) payment of accounts as and when "rendered up to the amount of £50 per annum. (b) Payment of "the whole of her educational expenses. Petitioner's costs."

The respondent died on January 18, 1952, and probate of his will was granted on June 21, 1952, to Lloyds Bank Ld. and Richard Trevis Scriven Hinde, the executors named in his will. When the respondent died the child of the marriage was over 21. Maintenance was paid in accordance with the order up to the death of the respondent, and there were no arrears when he died. After his death his executors refused to pay any more to the petitioner because they were of opinion that the order for maintenance only applied during the joint lives of the petitioner and respondent, and, consequently, when he died nothing more was due to the widow. The petitioner took out a summons on September 12, 1952, in the Divorce Division applying for leave to issue execution against the respondent's estate or, alternatively, against his executors. That application was made pursuant to Ord. 42, r. 23 (a),[1] which applied by reason of rule 80 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. The summons was supported by an affidavit by the solicitor for the petitioner in which it was said that the petitioner had not remarried.

By paragraph 7 of the affidavit: "As a result of the death of "the above-named respondent no steps have been taken to "enforce the said order without leave under the provisions of "rule 62 (1)[2] of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950. 8. I am "advised and verily believe that the above-named respondent's "estate is amply sufficient to satisfy the terms of the said order "relating to the maintenance of the petitioner. 9. There are no "arrears of maintenance due at the date of death of the above-"named respondent. 10. On February 18, 1952, I caused a copy

And such court or "judge may, if satisfied that the party "so applying is entitled to issue exe-"cution, make an order to that effect, "or may order that any issue or "question necessary to determine the "rights of the parties shall be tried "in any of the ways in which any "question in an action may be tried. "And in either case such court or "judge may impose such terms as to "costs or otherwise as shall be just."

The said executors by their said solicitors have refused to " pay the petitioner maintenance in accordance with the terms " of the said order."

On September 22, 1952, Mr. Registrar Kinsley dismissed the petitioner's summons, and on October 14, Barnard J., sitting in chambers, dismissed the appeal from the registrar's order and granted leave to appeal.

December 19, 1952. BIRKETT L.J. [in a written judgment, stated the facts substantially as set out above, and continued]:— The order of March 25, 1936, is, of course, unusual in form, and the circumstances in which it came into being cannot now be accurately ascertained. Counsel who addressed us on the appeal spoke about the mechanics of the order and how orders of this kind possibly come to be made, but on that matter it is enough to say that I think that the exact circumstances in which this rather unusual order came into being cannot now be accurately ascertained.

The provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, were then in force, but the order which we have to consider did not follow either subsection (1) or subsection (2) of section 190 of that Act. Subsection (1) of section 190 is in these terms: " The court may, if it thinks fit, on any " decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, order that the husband " shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such " gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not " exceeding her life, as having regard to her fortune, if any, " to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, " the court may deem to be reasonable, and the court may for " that purpose order that it shall be referred to one of the " conveyancing counsel of the court to settle and approve a " proper deed or instrument, to be executed by all the necessary " parties, and may, if it thinks fit, suspend the pronouncing of " the decree until the deed or instrument has been duly " executed."

It is perfectly obvious that the provisions of subsection (1) were not embodied in any form in the order with which we are concerned. Subsection (2) reads: " In any such case as afore- " said the court may, if it thinks fit, by order, either in addition " to or instead of an order under subsection (1) of this section, " direct the husband to pay to the wife during the joint lives of " the husband and wife such monthly or weekly sum for her " maintenance and support as the court may think reasonable."

Those provisions were in force at the time of the making of the order with which we have to deal, but there is no mention in the order of secured payments or any mention in terms of joint lives.

Counsel for the petitioner—and I think that I ought to say how greatly we were assisted by the arguments of counsel on both sides, who fully discussed all the relevant law in this matter—suggested that the omission of the words " joint lives " was deliberate, and that the reference to " until remarriage " in the order confirmed this view. He further said that the provisions relating to the maintenance of the child, and for her education, supported the view that the order was not intended to be for joint lives, but was to continue after the death of the respondent, if the petitioner had not remarried.

Counsel for the respondents submitted that the order being stated to have been made by consent, it would appear to be an order drawn up by the solicitors on one side and agreed to by the solicitors on the other side, and recorded as an order of the court, although the court would have have had no jurisdiction to make an order extending beyond the joint lives. He submitted, therefore, that if this was to be regarded as an order of the court, which the court could enforce, it must necessarily be an order for joint lives and no more. Counsel for the respondents submitted further, that on the true construction of the order, it was not intended to outlast the respondent's life, and an examination of the wording of the order would support that view. He contended that if the view of the petitioner that the order purported to extend beyond joint lives was right, then there was no power in the court to enforce it as an order, and that, at the most, it was evidence of an agreement between the parties which might be enforced in other proceedings, but not in these.

The summons in the present case asked for leave to issue execution against the estate of the respondent, but that, counsel said, was not permissible in these proceedings because in any event there was no power in the court to make an order extending beyond joint lives. He also submitted that the order should be construed by this court to give the order validity, and if it did so, the contention of the petitioner must fail.

In the last resort, I think that this appeal turns on the true construction of the order of March 25, 1936. It is to be observed that the order is "that Walter Stanley Hinde the respondent "do pay or cause to be paid," and would seem to indicate that the respondent is alive to fulfil his obligation. Nothing at all is said that contemplates his death, or as to what is to happen to the provision for maintenance in that contingency. Nothing is said to indicate that the maintenance is to be paid "during the "life of the wife," as was said in Kirk v. Eustace.[13] It is true that the order states that the respondent do pay or cause to be paid to the petitioner "until remarriage," and the petitioner has never remarried. But I do not think that this provision is in any sense conclusive of the matter, and must be read in conjunction with the rest of the order. In my view, the event of remarriage was remarriage in the lifetime of the respondent, and I see no ground for saying that the respondent, by that provision, was binding his estate to pay maintenance after his death if the petitioner had not remarried. If the petitioner had remarried in the lifetime of the respondent, the liability of the respondent would have ceased, and that, I think, was the intent and meaning of the words.

The provision for the child Eleanor Margaret Hinde is made part of the order. Walter Stanley Hinde is to pay accounts when rendered, up to £50 per annum, and the whole of the educational expenses. The jurisdiction of the court to order payments is contained in section 193 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The court cannot order payment after the child reaches the age of 21. The provisions of the order relating to the child of the marriage would seem to have been framed on the view that Walter Stanley Hinde would be alive to meet them, and nothing whatever is said about what is to happen if the father dies before the educational expenses are complete, or what is to happen to the payments of £50 per annum in the event of his death. All these matters seem to me to point to the conclusion that the order was made on the footing of joint lives.

In the course of the argument many cases were cited to us, but I do not think that any of them was in any sense of decisive help in this case. In Kirk v. Eustace,[13] the headnote reads: "By a deed made in 1922 providing for a separation between "husband and wife, and containing mutual covenants to live "separate and apart, the husband covenanted with his wife to "pay her the weekly sum of £2 during her life for her mainten- "ance and support, but determinable upon reconciliation. In "1936 the husband died. The widow claimed that his estate was "liable to continue paying the maintenance during the rest of "her life, but the executors contended that the liability had "come to an end by the husband's death:—Held, that as the "deed provided that the weekly payment to the wife should "continue during her life and as there was nothing in the "language used to show an intention that the husband's obliga- "tion should continue only during his life, his estate remained "liable to pay the weekly sum to the widow," and the decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed.

It is to be observed that in the argument of counsel for the appellant it was said that "The obligation undertaken by the "husband was to pay that sum to the wife during her life, and ". . . it follows by virtue of section 80 of the Law of Property "Act, 1925, that it is binding on the husband's estate." Lord Atkin said [14]: "Therefore, this contract, which is under seal, "is to be read as if it were made by the husband for his executors "and administrators, unless a contrary intention is found "expressed in the covenant. So far the matter seems to me to "be beyond question, and the wife has the right expressed in "the deed. From the judgment given by the late Mr. Owen, "sitting as deputy county court judge—the judgment of a very "careful, learned and experienced lawyer—he apparently had no "doubt upon the matter, and he gave reasons which appear to "me to be convincing for holding that the plaintiff was entitled "to recover. On appeal, the majority of the Court of Appeal "took a different view; Slesser and Scott L.JJ. differed from "Eve J., the majority taking the view that in this particular "deed a contrary intention was expressed as to the covenant "binding the estate of the testator, or, in other words, continuing "after his death. The view that was taken was that in a deed "of this kind (I am now paraphrasing the grounds of the judg- "ment, but I think I am expressing them accurately) the main "object was to provide for the parties living apart; on the death "of the husband they could no longer live apart—I think that is "true—and inasmuch as they could no longer live apart, the "whole basis of the contract had disappeared, and thereupon all "the agreements came to an end."

That case was considered by the Court of Appeal in Langstone v. Hayes,[15] and I think that that case is perhaps the most helpful of the cases cited, though, I repeat, none of the cases, in my view, was of decisive help in this case. The headnote of that case reads: "There is no rule of law that a covenant in a "separation deed by a husband to pay his wife an annuity is "intended to bind the estate of the covenantor. Whether it does "so or not, depends on the construction of the provisions of the "deed." "By a deed of separation executed on June 10, 1926, "by Cecil Joseph Langstone and his wife, it was provided by "clause 1 (i) that the wife might at all future times live apart "from the husband and free from his control. By clause 1 (iii) "'The husband will pay to the wife . . . for her separate use "'and for the maintenance and support of herself a clear

" ' annuity of £104 . . . payable by weekly payments of £2 cash " ' . . . until determined as provided by clause 3 (ii),' which " was that: ' if, at any future time, the spouses shall with their " ' mutual consent again cohabit as man and wife, or the wife " ' shall not remain chaste, the annuity . . . shall thereupon " ' determine and the deed shall then become void ' "; and there were various other clauses about non-molestation and the like.

MacKinnon L.J., who read the judgment of Scott L.J. in that case as the judgment of the court, said [16]: " The sole issue tried " by the learned judge was whether on its true construction the " covenant by the husband bound his personal representative, or " was limited to the joint lives of the spouses. Counsel for the " widow both below and before us relied on the decision of the " House of Lords in Kirk v. Eustace,[17] or alternatively, if that " decision did not conclude the appeal in his favour, he submitted " that his contention gave the proper meaning to the covenant and " he further relied on certain observations of Lord Atkin, and " possibly of Lord Russell of Killowen in that case. In our view " neither argument avails the widow. Unless the deed or written " contract under consideration is a matter of common form, at " least in respect of the particular provision which falls to be " considered, it is dangerous to seek to apply to it the judicial " interpretation of another document unless that other docu- " ment is so similar in its terms as to be almost identical; " a principle applied to a separation deed by Bowen L.J. in " Nicol v. Nicol.[18] In Kirk v. Eustace [19] the deed of separa- " tion stated repeatedly and expressly that the husband's " obligation to pay was to endure ' during the life of the " ' wife.' The majority of the Court of Appeal in that case " (Slesser and Scott L.JJ., Eve J. differing) thought that even " that clear expression of intention ought to give way to other " indications in the deed of an intention that it was only to " operate during the joint lives of the spouses "—that was the view of the Court of Appeal, which was reversed, of course, in the House of Lords—" The instant deed, as the county court " judge has pointed out, differs in an important respect from the " deed in Kirk v. Eustace,[19] that is to say, by the complete " omission from the deed of the phrase ' during the life of the " ' wife.' There were apparently no children of the marriage."

MacKinnon L.J. then read clauses 1 (i), 1 (iii) and 3 (ii) of the deed and continued [20]: " I can see nothing in these provisions " to extend the husband's covenant beyond the term of their " joint lives: everything presumes the continuance of his life " during performance of the covenant to pay. This view of the " agreement is supported by other terms in the deed. Every " one of these provisions seems to us in terms to assume that " the husband is still alive and therefore to apply only to the "period of their joint lives; thus distinguishing this deed of "separation, on a radical point of its terms, from Kirk v. "Eustace.[21]"

Langstone v. Hayes[22] seems to make it clear that the construction of the order in this present case is the all-important thing, and that the order must be read as a whole. The conclusions to which I have come, therefore, are these: (1) If this order is to have validity as an order of the court, it must be construed as an order made for joint lives; and (2) the construction of the order, in its use of the name of the respondent simply, in the absence of any reference to the life of the wife as the period in which maintenance is to be paid, in the use of the words "until remarriage" in the context of the order, in the provisions for maintenance of the child of the marriage contained in the same order, all seem to me to point to the order being one in which the liabilities of the respondent were limited to the joint lives of the husband and wife.

For these reasons, I think that the decision of Barnard J. was right, and that this order does not extend the liability of the respondent to his estate after his death.

Counsel for the respondents cited several cases in support of the view that where there was an order of the court, the contract which lay behind the order might, in certain circumstances, be enforced and sued upon; but the circumstances in which this order was made by consent in 1936 were not before us, and on that part of the case I do not think that it would be useful or profitable to say anything.

I think that the present summons, which sought leave to issue execution against the estate of the respondent, cannot succeed, and, for the reasons which I have given, I think that the order of March 25, 1936, imposed liability on the respondent for joint lives only. In my opinion, therefore, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

MORRIS L.J. [reading his judgment, stated the facts and continued]:—The form of the proceedings makes it clear that the application to the court is for enforcement of an order of the court for maintenance of the wife. It does not appear to be suggested that any order of the court for the maintenance or education of Eleanor Margaret Hinde, the child of the marriage, still has effect. What is said, however, either expressly or by implication, is that by the order of March 25, 1936, the court made an order binding the husband or, after his death, his estate, to pay maintenance at the stated rate to the wife until her remarriage.

When the order was made the statutory provisions in force were those contained in section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. [His Lordship read subsections (1) and (2) of section 190 and continued:] Then section

193 (1) provides: "In any proceedings for divorce or nullity of "marriage or judicial separation, the court may from time to "time, either before or by or after the final decree, make such "provision as appears just with respect to the custody, main- "tenance and education of the children, the marriage of whose "parents is the subject of the proceedings, or, if it thinks fit, "direct proper proceedings to be taken for placing the children "under the protection of the court."

It follows that the only jurisdiction which the court had to order the husband to pay £300 per annum to the wife was limited to the period of the joint lives. Though parties may agree upon amounts or may make agreements as to payments, they cannot by consent confer on the court a jurisdiction which it does not possess. Thus, in In re Aylmer[23] Lord Esher M.R., in the course of his judgment, referred to the "well-known rule" that "the consent of parties cannot give the court a jurisdiction which "it does not otherwise possess." See also British Wagon Co. Ld. v. Gray.[24]

In Maidlow v. Maidlow[25] there was an agreed order for payment of maintenance to a wife "for her life." It was held in this court, affirming the decision of the president, that the court could not accede to the husband's petition for a decrease of the amount of maintenance. It was said by Swinfen Eady L.J. that if there had been an order by consent in the language of the statute for the payment of maintenance to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife, then the mere fact that the parties had agreed the amount to be paid would not have prevented an application from being made for a modification of the order, if the circumstances of the parties afterwards changed. But the order which was made by consent was for payment to the wife "for her life." In reference to it, Swinfen Eady L.J. said[26]: "It is objected that, unless the parties consented to an "order in that form, there was no jurisdiction in the judge to "make such an order. He could order payment of maintenance "during the joint lives under the statute, but there is no power "under section 1 (2) to order payment to the wife during her "life. Under section 1 (1) there is power to secure to the wife "such gross sum of money or such annual sum of money for any "term not exceeding her life as, having regard to the various "circumstances, may be deemed reasonable, and under subsec- "tion (2) power to order payment to the wife during their joint "lives of such monthly or weekly sum as may be reasonable. "It is urged that there was a bargain between the husband and "wife, which the court is not at liberty to vary, and that the wife "accepted a less sum than she might otherwise have claimed, "so that she might have the advantage of receiving it for her "life. In my opinion an order so made cannot be subsequently "varied."

HINDE v. HINDE AND ANOTHER.
Morris L.J.

That case shows that the court will recognize a consensual arrangement and will not interfere with it, but the case does not establish that the court will lend its process to enforce as an order that which is drawn up in the form of an order, but which in reality is the statement of an agreement in terms which the court would have no jurisdiction to impose. It is to be pointed out that in the present case there are not the words "for her "life," though there are the words "until her remarriage."

In Mills v. Mills [27] the facts were that "A wife obtained a "decree absolute of divorce on November 21, 1932. An order "by consent was made on December 29, 1932, directing the "husband to pay to the wife during their joint lives and until "further order maintenance of £5 a week, 'without prejudice to "'any further order.' In 1933 payments fell into arrear, and "the wife took out a judgment summons for £90. The parties "then agreed that the husband should pay the wife a lump sum "of £1,250 in full discharge of all claims by her to maintenance. "On October 9, 1933, an order was made embodying the agree-"ment. The order also discharged the order of December 29, "1932, and dismissed the maintenance petition and the judgment "summons. On January 31, 1940, the wife took out a summons "calling on the husband to show cause why she should not have "liberty to apply for maintenance in accordance with the pro-"visions contained in the order of October 9, 1933:—Held, "reversing Bucknill J., that the application was not 'on' a "decree for divorce within the meaning of section 190 of the "Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and "that the court had no jurisdiction to grant it."

In the course of his judgment Sir Wilfrid Greene M.R. said [28]: "The order on the face of it also purports to direct payment of a "lump sum. That payment is something which the court had "not jurisdiction in itself to order, because the jurisdiction of "the court, so far as relevant, is confined to securing, under "subsection (1) of section 190 a gross or annual sum, or under "subsection (2) ordering the payment of a periodical sum to the "wife. It is settled that the court has not power to order "payment to the wife out and out of a lump sum. But it has "also been held that the court has jurisdiction by consent to "make an order of that character. The order, therefore, on the "face of it, is an order by consent directing the husband to do "something which the court, apart from consent, could never "order him to do; and by consent it is discharging the original "order, and dismissing the petition upon which it was made."

Then later, the Master of the Rolls said [29]: "There is one "further point, before I leave this matter, on the form of order, "on which I should like to comment. I have already said that "there is no jurisdiction in the court to order payment to the

[28] Ibid. 130.
[29] Ibid. 134.

"wife of a lump sum. Such payment can only be consensual. "That being so, I take the view that in such cases it is not "desirable that the court should direct the payment of such a "lump sum, which is merely consensual. There is no necessity "for the court to be appearing by consent to be making an "order which it has no jurisdiction to make at all. There are "many other ways of providing for these matters. What the "court has jurisdiction to do is, of course, to discharge its "previous order. The sum can be paid first, in which case all "that is required is a recital in the order that such and such "an agreed sum having been paid in full satisfaction, and an "order by consent that the existing maintenance order be "discharged. If the sum has not been paid, I see no reason why "the order should not take the form that upon payment of the "sum the existing order should stand discharged, when the "ordinary routine would be, as is the practice in another "Division, that upon the party producing before the registrar an "affidavit verifying the payment, the existing maintenance order "would be discharged."

But it may well happen that the parties, who have made a contract, cause a consent order to be drawn up, which in its effect is no more than evidence of their contract. Thus, in Wentworth v. Bullen,[30] Parke J. said: "Now though there is no remedy "for disobedience of a judge's order (as such) by one of the "parties against another by action, but by attachment merely, "yet if it be made by the consent of both, and is founded on a "binding agreement, an action will not the less lie upon that "agreement, though it have also the additional sanction of a "judge's order. The contract of the parties is not the less a "contract, and subject to the incidents of a contract, because "there is superadded the command of the judge."

The words "by consent" in the order of March 25, 1936, may denote that the parties agreed the amounts which the court, acting within its jurisdiction, could order the husband to pay, or they may denote that the parties agreed to the terms extending beyond those which the court, acting within its jurisdiction, could order. A consent order may amount to a contract, or may be evidence of, or corroboration of, some contract which has already been made. But if the court is invited to make an order by consent, and if an order is then drawn up which, according to one construction, is within the powers of the court, but according to another construction is not, the court will proceed on the basis that the order is an order made within the powers of the court until it is shown that the position was that the parties merely made a contract, and that the consent order was intended to be the embodiment or the evidence of the terms agreed.

The application made in the present case was to enforce in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division an order made [30] 9 B. & C. 840, 850.

C. A.

HINDE v. HINDE AND ANOTHER.
Morris L.J.

in that Division; that is, the order of March 25, 1936. That order, if it was an order which was made within the power and jurisdiction of the court, must have been one to operate during the joint lives of the husband and wife, even though this is not expressly stated in the order. If, therefore, it was such an order, the application to enforce it after the death of the husband rightly failed. If it was not such an order, but if it is contended that there was a contract imposing an obligation not affected by the death of the husband, then the existence of such a contract must be established before there could be leave to issue execution.

The present proceedings, which are brought against the executors, are brought for the purpose of enforcing in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division an order made in that Division, and are not appropriate for advancing a contention that a purely contractual obligation has not been fulfilled. If it is sought to be said that the order of March 25, 1936, went beyond an order of the court made within its jurisdiction and was a contract in terms beyond the powers of the court, or was evidence of such a contract, then this contention must be advanced in some proceedings raising it as an issue to be tried. It may be that there is no evidence of a contract other than such as is afforded by the circumstance that in the order of March 25, 1936, which on this basis was not merely or strictly an order, there is no stated overriding limitation referable to the continuance of the joint lives.

Whether any other evidence exists is not known to the court; none has been mentioned. If the parties had wished to make provision extending beyond their joint lives they could have done so in some clear, formal document. The order of March 25, 1936, does not on its face, or by its terms, contain any clear indication that it overran the statutory powers of the court.

In my judgment this appeal must fail, because leave to issue execution upon the order of March 25, 1936, was rightly refused for the reason that if it was an order of the Divorce Court it was not made, and could not have been made, so as to operate beyond the period of the joint lives.

The possibility of asserting in an action, and of seeking to prove and establish, that there was a contract as alleged by the wife, can neither be excluded nor encouraged.

Master and servant—Catering business—Minimum wages scale—Worker "employed in" undertaking — Restaurant cloakroom attendant — Remuneration by tips only—Self-employed person—Work performed in pursuance of arrangement made by worker by way of trade—Worker "deemed to be employed"—Catering Wages Act, 1943 (6 & 7 Geo. 6, c. 24), s. 1 (2) (4).

The Catering Wages Act, 1943, under which minimum rates of wages are laid down in the case of various classes of employees in the catering business, provides in section 1 (2) that "the workers "to whom this Act applies are all persons employed in any under-"taking" coming within the Act, and by section 1 (4) that for the purposes of the Act, "any worker who, for the purposes of any "undertaking . . . performs any work in pursuance of an arrange-"ment . . . made by the worker by way of trade with the persons "carrying on that undertaking shall be deemed to be employed by "them in that undertaking. . . ."

A cloakroom attendant in a restaurant, for which class of employee a minimum rate of wages is provided, was engaged on the terms of a verbal agreement under which she was to be remunerated by tips only, and by the terms of which her employers, while entitled to dismiss or suspend her, did not exercise over the manner in which she did her work such a control as would constitute a contract of service between the parties. On the termination of her employment she brought an action in which she claimed to be entitled to the minimum rate of wages applicable to an employee in her grade:—

Held, (1) that she was not "employed in" the undertaking within the meaning of section 1 (2) of the Act, since the words "employed in" contemplated the existence of a contract of service, and did not mean merely "working in" the undertaking; but (2) that the arrangement between the parties provided for the worker doing the kind of work to which a minimum rate of wages applied; that such arrangement was made by the worker by way of trade, using that term in the sense of commercial employment; and that she must accordingly be deemed to have been employed by the persons carrying on the undertaking within the meaning of section 1 (4) of the Act and was, therefore, entitled to the minimum rate of wages applicable in the case of a cloakroom attendant.

ACTION.

The facts as found by Birkett L.J. were substantially as follows: The plaintiff, Bertha Celina Pauley, had been a cloakroom attendant since 1946. In 1949 she was out of employment and entered her name on the books of an employment agency, who sent her name to the defendants, Kenaldo Ld., the proprietors of the "96" Restaurant, Piccadilly. On July 10, 1949, she was interviewed by the general manager of the defendant company. Pursuant to instructions received from the board of directors of the company, the plaintiff was asked whether she would take over the cloakroom at the defendants' restaurant "on "her own." She was told that she would have to do the cleaning, all materials being provided by the defendants, and was informed as to the hours of work and the free meals which would be provided for her, and that she would have no wages, but would be allowed to keep all the tips. In the event of her wanting an evening off, she would be expected to provide a proper substitute and remunerate her. The plaintiff was also informed that she was not being employed by the defendants as one of their own servants, but was self-employed and on her own.

The plaintiff in her evidence said that it was originally suggested that she should pay 10s. a week for being allowed to have the cloakroom, but that the suggestion was subsequently withdrawn. This was not accepted by the defendants' general manager, who said that he had no recollection of it. The plaintiff also said that it was never suggested that she should take the cloakroom "on her own," and that she regarded herself as being employed in the same way as all the other members of the staff. She admitted that she stamped her own national insurance card as a self-employed person after the secretary of the company had refused to stamp them on behalf of the defendants as employers, and agreed that she did not clock in like other members of the staff.

On July 7, 1950, the plaintiff gave a week's notice to the defendants, and subsequently her union, the National Union of General and Municipal Workers, made a claim for arrears of wages to which she claimed to be entitled under the provisions of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and of the Wages Regulations (Licensed Residential Establishment and Licensed Restaurant) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 908), made on May 12, 1949. The claim was repudiated by the defendants on the ground that the plaintiff had never been in their employ within the meaning of section 1 (2) of the Catering Wages Act, 1943. The plaintiff thereupon brought the present action in which it was agreed that the arrears of wages, if recoverable, amounted to £200.

PAULEY v. KENALDO LD.

Birkett L.J.

December 18, 1952. BIRKETT L.J., in a written judgment, stated the nature of the plaintiff's claim and continued:—Before I consider the facts, or the law to be applied, it might, perhaps, be well to summarize the effect of the pleadings and the submissions of counsel on the evidence. In its simplest form, the case for the plaintiff was that she came within the provisions of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, and the case for the defendants was that she did not, and it was agreed that if she did come within the provisions of the Act she was entitled to the £200, but not otherwise. The Act is described as: "An Act to make "provision for regulating the remuneration and conditions of "employment of catering and other workers and, in connexion "therewith, for their health and welfare and the general improve- "ment and development of the industries in which they are "employed."

Mr. O'Connor, for the plaintiff, submitted: (1) that the plaintiff was at all material times a worker to whom the provisions of the Act applied; (2) that she was therefore a worker for whom "statutory minimum remuneration for employment" had been fixed by the provisions of a Statutory Instrument, 1949, No. 908, made on May 12, 1949, called the Wages Regulation (Licensed Residential Establishment and Licensed Restaurant) Order, 1949, made by the Minister of Labour and National Service by virtue of his powers under the Act contained in section 8; the minimum rate for a cloakroom and toilet attendant is set out in paragraph 2 of the first schedule to the order; (3) that she was employed by the defendants as a cloakroom and toilet attendant under a contract of service made orally between the parties in June, 1949; (4) alternatively, that she was employed by the defendants within the true meaning of section 1 (2) of the Act; and (5), in the further alternative, she was "deemed to be employed" by the defendants by reason of section 1 (4) of the Act.

Mr. Rodger Winn, for the defendants, submitted: (1) that on the facts of this case, the Catering Wages Act of 1943, and the Statutory Instrument of May 12, 1949, had no application to the plaintiff; (2) that there was no contract of service made between the parties in June, 1949, or at all; and (3) that the provisions of section 1 (2) and (4) of the Act did not enable the plaintiff to say that she was employed within the meaning of subsection (2), or that she was "deemed to be employed" within the meaning of subsection (4).

The facts were very much in dispute, and at times the evidence was a little confused. What was said at one interview was mixed up with what was said at another, the reason no doubt being that it was a matter of some difficulty in 1952 to recall clearly and coherently what had been said in 1949. But the main points of difference are fairly clear, and without intending to cast the smallest aspersion on the plaintiff, I will say at once that I prefer and accept the evidence of the defendants on the main facts in dispute.

1952

PAULEY v. KENALDO LD.

Birkett L.J.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The first question I have to decide is whether the plaintiff was a worker employed in the defendants' undertaking. Subsection (1) of section 1 of the Catering Wages Act, 1943, reads: "The Minister "of Labour and National Service (hereafter in this Act referred "to as 'the Minister') shall establish a commission, to be called "the Catering Wages Commission, (hereafter in this Act referred "to as 'the Commission') to perform, in relation to the workers "to whom this Act applies and their employers, such functions "as are entrusted to the commission by this Act." Subsection (2) is in these terms: "The workers to whom this Act applies "are all persons employed in any undertaking, or any part of "an undertaking, . . . which consists wholly or mainly in the "carrying on (whether for profit or not) of one or more of the fol-"lowing activities, that is to say, the supply of food or drink for "immediate consumption, the provision of living accommodation "for guests or lodgers or for persons employed in the undertaking "and any other activity so far as it is incidental or ancillary to "any such activity as aforesaid of the undertaking."

It is first said on the plaintiff's behalf that she was so employed under a contract of service made orally in June, 1949. This is a question of fact, as was stated by Warrington J. in In re Winter German Opera Ld.,[5] where he said[6]: "The question in "this and similar cases must turn upon the particular facts of "each particular case, and the authority of other cases, and "particularly of cases based upon different statutes, was of very "little assistance." Much point is given to that observation by a glance at Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, vol. 2, pp. 943 to 949, where a bewildering array of decisions on various statutes is set out, and the construction of the word "employment" is dealt with.

In Gould v. Minister of National Insurance,[7] Ormerod J. said: "It is easy in some cases to say that the contract is a contract "of service and in others that it is a contract for services, but "between these two extremes there are a large number of cases "where the line is much more difficult to draw. Although the "authority of cases based on different statutes may be of very "little assistance in deciding any particular case, it is possible "to extract from these authorities a common principle upon "which the decisions are founded. It is clear that the real "question is one of the degree of control exercised by the person "employing the artiste, and this, as I see it, means not only the "amount of control but the nature of that control and the direc-"tion in which it is exercised." He then went on to deal with the matter at further length: "In Short v. J. & W. Henderson

[7] [1951] 1 K.B. 731, 734.

" Ld.,[8] a case in the House of Lords under the Workmen's " Compensation Acts, Lord Thankerton recapitulated with ap- ' proval the four indicia of a contract of service derived by the " Lord Justice Clerk in the Court of Session in Park v. Wilsons " & Clyde Coal Co. Ld.[9] from the authorities referred to by him. " These are: (a) the master's power of selection of his servant; " (b) the payment of wages or other remuneration; (c) the " master's right to control the doing of the work; and (d) the " master's right of suspension or dismissal. He goes on to say " ' that the principal requirement of a contract of service is the " ' right of the master in some reasonable sense to control the " ' method of doing the work, and that this factor of super- " ' intendence and control has frequently been treated as critical " ' and decisive of the legal quality of the relationship.' "

In this case before me, the defendants selected the plaintiff; there was remuneration solely by tips (and, of course, a person may be none the less a servant by reason of the fact that his remuneration consists solely of tips); the defendants could suspend or dismiss the plaintiff; but, in my opinion, they did not control the manner in which the work should be done. The plaintiff was not obliged to clock-in as the other servants were; she stamped her own card as a self-employed person within section 1 (2) (a) and (b) of the National Insurance Act of 1946; she could stay away when she pleased, and provide and pay for a substitute or an assistant; and though the defendants required the work to be done, they did not control the manner in which it was to be done.

I have come to the conclusion on all the facts of this case that there was no contract of service between the plaintiff and the defendants, and that it was well understood between them that the plaintiff was a self-employed person, and I do not accept the evidence of the plaintiff when she says otherwise. For the space of a year she appears to have been quite content, and with good reason. I was given no reliable evidence of the amount which she received in tips, for she kept no accounts and paid no income tax. There was no P.A.Y.E. card as in the case of other employees, and whilst she told me that the amount she received was about £7 a week, from certain other information she gave, and from the evidence about banquets and other special occasions, I incline to the view that she received more than that. It would appear to me that the Union took up this matter as a question of principle, and the fact that the plaintiff, as I think, was remunerated on a handsome scale by the tips she received, must not obscure the point of principle to be determined.

It was then said on behalf of the plaintiff that if she was not employed under a contract of service, the meaning of the word " employed " in subsection (2) of section 1 of the Act was merely that of "working in," and that the section should therefore be read as "The workers to whom this Act applies are all persons "working in any undertaking." I cannot accept this contention, for it seems to me that if that interpretation is to be put upon the words, it is a strange thing that Parliament did not use the words "working in" instead of the word "employment." I think, therefore, that the plaintiff fails to bring herself within subsection (2) of section 1 of the Act.

Subsection (4) of section 1 seems to me to be the substantial question in the case. That subsection reads: "For the purposes "of this Act, any worker who, for the purposes of any under- "taking or part of an undertaking, performs any work in pur- "suance of an arrangement express or implied made by the "worker by way of trade with the persons carrying on that "undertaking shall be deemed to be employed by them in that "undertaking or part."

If the Act is looked at as a whole, it is plain that the intention is to provide a complete code for the catering industry so far as conditions of work and remuneration are concerned. The Catering Wages Commission referred to in subsection (1) of section 1 is given very wide powers. In the Statutory Instrument 1949, No. 908, made by the Minister of Labour and National Service, which came into operation on June 1, 1949, the cloakroom attendant is specifically provided for. On page 12 of that order: "Cloakroom and toilet attendant is a worker aged 21 "years or over who is wholly or mainly employed on one or more "of the following duties, that is to say, the receipt, custody and "issue of personal effects deposited in the cloakroom, or the "charge of, and responsibility for cleaning, or for the cleanliness "of, toilets." And in paragraph 2 of the First Schedule the rates applicable to cloakroom and toilet attendant (female) are set out. In paragraph 22 of the order the workers to whom the schedule applies are listed: "Subject to the provisions of para- "graph 23 the provisions of this schedule apply to all workers "employed in Great Britain in a catering undertaking who are "employed by the person or body of persons carrying on that "undertaking and who are so employed either" and then various categories are set out; and, finally under "(h)," "any work "other than that specified in sub-paragraphs (a) to (g) hereof "performed on or about the premises or place where food or "drink is prepared or served or where living accommodation is "provided, including work in connexion with any service or "amenity provided on or about such premises or place."

Looking at subsection (4) in the light of all this, it is plain, and, indeed, it is not contested by Mr. Rodger Winn, that the plaintiff is a worker; she is in fact a cloakroom and toilet attendant. Secondly, her work is for the purpose of an under- taking, that is, the defendants' restaurant; thirdly, that work is performed in pursuance of an express arrangement made by the worker with the defendants who are carrying on that undertaking.

The crucial question which remains, and I think the only question, therefore, is: is that arrangement made by the worker by way of trade? If the answer is in the affirmative, then the plaintiff "shall be deemed to be employed" by the defendants "in that "undertaking."

The contest on this point was simple and short. Mr. Rodger Winn submitted that the words "by way of trade" meant that the worker who made the arrangement with the persons carrying on the undertaking must be carrying on a specific trade and made the arrangement as such trader. He submitted that the plaintiff was not carrying on any trade, and that the arrangement she made in this case with the defendants was therefore not made "by way of trade."

When one looks at the "Table of Weekly Minimum "Remuneration" in paragraph 2 of the First Schedule, and at all the various workers who are there set out, barman, barmaid, cashier, cellarman, chamber maid, chef, cleaner, clerk or receptionist, cloakroom attendant, cook, fireman and housekeeper, it would be difficult to say that any of them carried on a trade in the ordinary acceptation of that term, but they are all listed as workers to whom minimum rates apply.

Mr. Rodger Winn said that the meaning of the words "by "way of trade" ought not to be extended beyond the definition for which he contended. Mr. O'Connor, on the other hand, submitted that the words should not be so narrowly construed, and that they were wide enough in this case to cover the arrangement made; and, indeed, were intended to do so in order that the scheme of the Act of 1943 should not be weakened by any attempts at evasion. Mr. O'Connor said (and it is right that I should repeat) that in this case the good faith of the defendants had never been impugned, and I should add that under the arrangement made with the plaintiff, that could scarcely be suggested, because it was, I think, of an extremely profitable character, far exceeding the minimum wages laid down in the schedule to the order.

In the Trade Boards Act, 1909, these same words, "by way "of trade," appear, and it is to be observed that the marginal note to section 9 of that Act reads "prevention of evasion." Section 9 is in these terms: "Any shopkeeper, dealer, or trader, "who by way of trade makes any arrangement express or implied "with any worker in pursuance of which the worker performs "any work for which a minimum rate of wages has been fixed "under this Act, shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act "to be the employer of the worker, and the net remuneration "obtainable by the worker in respect of the work after allowing "for his necessary expenditure in connexion with the work shall "be deemed to be wages."

I gain considerable assistance, although the facts are very different, from Skinner v. Jack Breach Ld.[10] The headnote of that case reads: "By Orders made under the Trade Boards Acts, "1909 and 1918, the Minister of Labour directed that those Acts "should apply to 'the mending, refitting and reconditioning of "'drift nets,' which thereby became a 'specified trade' within "the meaning of the Acts, and in due course the trade board "fixed for certain classes of female workers in the trade minimum "rates of wages, which were made obligatory by an order of "the Minister of Labour. The appellant, one of the workers in "respect of whom the trade board had fixed minimum wages, had "been employed for over three years, and was employed, with "30 other women, by the respondents, who were fishermen and "owners of fishing boats, in mending drift nets, which were "exclusively the property of the respondents and were only used "by them in their business:—Held, that the Trade Board Acts "applied to workers in a 'specified trade' by whomsoever they "were employed, if their employment was regular and for "commercial purposes, and not only to workers employed in a "'specified trade' by an employer who was solely engaged in "the same trade, and, therefore, the respondents were bound to "pay to the appellant the minimum wage fixed by the trade "board for workers of her class in her branch of industry."

PAULEY v. KENALDO LD.

Birkett L.J.

Whilst, as I have said, the facts in that case were wholly different from the facts with which I have to deal, it does assist in some degree in shedding light on the meaning of the words "by way of trade," and I observe that in his argument Sir Douglas Hogg A.-G. said[11]: "In the Trade Boards Acts, the "object of which is to prevent the underpayment of workers, "'trade' is used in the sense of the operations which are carried "on by the worker by way of business; see section 1 (1) and (2), "section 4 (1), and other sections of the Act of 1909; and it is "immaterial that the employer is engaged in a trade different "from that which he employs the worker to carry on." Then a little later he said[12]: "Section 9, which compels the payment "of the minimum wage to those who might be thought to be "independent contractors, shows that the legislature regarded "the matter from the point of view of the worker and his work, "and wished to secure that a worker who was commercially "employed should receive proper wages for his work, whatever "the object for which that work was produced." That, of course, was the argument.

Lord Hewart C.J., in his judgment, used these words[13]: "We have to regard the true meaning of the Trade Boards Acts "and the orders and regulations made under them. No doubt in "a great many contexts the word 'trade' indicates a process of "buying and selling, but that is by no means an exhaustive "definition of its meaning. It may also mean a calling or "industry or class of skilled labour. When one looks at Acts of "Parliament like the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, it appears that "the word 'trade' is commonly used to indicate the position "created by the relation of employer and employed in certain "branches or classes of industry." Then further on the Lord Chief Justice said [14]: "The meaning which has to be collected "from phrases like that—and they by no means stand alone— "and from the whole scheme and purpose of the Act is rein- "forced by the particular language of section 9. That section, "no doubt, deals with an individual matter, but it contains words "which illuminate the purpose of the statute as a whole. It "shows that, even where an outworker, or a worker who provides "some of the requisite materials or tools, is concerned, the Act "regards the nature of the work performed, and that, if the "worker is doing a kind of work to which a minimum rate of "wages applies, it matters not that the 'shopkeeper, dealer, or "'trader' would not describe his business, or the whole of it, by "words applicable to that particular branch of industry." Then a little further on in the judgment [15]: "It is enough to say that "casual work is not within the scope of the Acts, nor is work "given to another by a private person. There must be trade in "the sense of commercial employment, but if that is present it "does not matter that the description of the work done by the "worker is not exhaustive of the description of the whole "business of the employer."

In the present case I think that I have to consider the whole purpose and design of the Catering Wages Act of 1943, and I think that its purpose was to see that the workers employed in an undertaking supplying food and drink for immediate consumption, such as the "96" Restaurant, or in any incidental or ancillary activity of the undertaking, should receive wages based on the figures laid down by the commission; and where on the special facts of any particular case it would not be said that they were employed within the meaning of section 1 (2) of the Act, either by a contract of service or otherwise, nevertheless, if there was an arrangement made by the worker with the persons carrying on the undertaking, and that arrangement provided for the worker to do the kind of work to which a minimum rate of wages applied, and that arrangement was by "way of trade," using and interpreting the term in the sense of commercial employment, the worker shall "be deemed to be employed by "the persons carrying on the undertaking." That, I think, was the position of the plaintiff on the facts of this case, and I therefore give judgment for her for the agreed sum of £200 and the costs of the action.

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Woodworking machine—Fencing—Protection against contact—Not against parts accidentally flying out of machine—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14 (1)—Woodworking Machinery Regulations (S.R. & O. 1922, No. 1196), 1922–1945, reg. 17.

By the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922–1945, reg. 17: "The cutter of every vertical spindle moulding machine shall when "practicable be provided with the most efficient guard having "regard to the nature of the work which is being performed."

The plaintiff was operating a vertical spindle moulding machine when one of the cutters flew off and he was struck in the eye by the cutter's bolt. The Shaw guard fitted to the machine was the most effective guard to protect an operator from coming into contact with the cutters, but another type of guard would have been more efficient to protect him against the danger of pieces flying out from the machine. In an action for damages for personal injuries the plaintiff alleged that the defendant employer, in failing to provide an efficient guard to protect him from flying pieces of metal, was in breach of regulation 17 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922 to 1945.

Held, first, following Miller v. William Boothman & Sons Ltd. [1944] K.B. 337; 60 T.L.R. 218; [1944] 1 All E.R. 333, that the regulations modified the absolute obligation to fence securely imposed by section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. Secondly, that when the regulations specified in detail the guard which had to be used, that guard and nothing else, must be provided, and if a guard of that specific type was fitted and a part of the machine flew out and injured the operator, it would appear that he would have no cause of action on the ground of a breach of the regulation. Where, however, as in regulation 17, the regulations did not specify in detail the particular guard to be provided, any ambiguity was to be resolved by having regard to the general object of section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, as interpreted by the House of Lords in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ld. [1946] A.C. 493; 62 T.L.R. 320; [1946] 2 All E.R. 92, and Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ld. [1948] A.C. 477; 64 T.L.R. 384; [1948] 2 All E.R. 386—that the obligation was to guard against contact with any dangerous part of the machine (the cutters in the present case) and not against dangerous materials ejected from it. The object of regulation 17 was therefore to prevent an employee from making contact with the cutters, and on the facts there had been no breach of the regulation which caused the accident to the plaintiff.

ACTION.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a wood-cutting machinist and was in charge of several wood-working machines in the defendant's joiner's shop. On March 29, 1950, the plaintiff had to set up a machine for the purpose of running a windowsill from a straight piece of wood 5 ins. wide, 3 ins. thick and 5 ft. 6 ins. long. The machine which he used was a vertical spindle moulder powered by electricity; it had a spindle head piece unit, which received and carried an interchangeable square cutter block and attained a speed of 4,500 revolutions a minute. The cutter block was 4 ins. by 3 ins. by 3 ins. with a groove, dovetail fashion, running lengthwise on four sides which received cutter bolts; the grooves, with washers and nuts, were the only means of securing the cutter to the block. Although old, the machine was in good condition.

1952

The plaintiff put two cutters on the cutter block and tightened them up with a spanner. He fitted a guard on the machine and, before operating it on the wood, proceeded to make the usual test run to ascertain whether the cutters were properly balanced, using, as was his practice, a piece of thin cardboard or cigarette carton between the cutter and the block. The machine was just about to reach its maximum speed, and the plaintiff was standing about 2 ft. 6 ins. away from it, when a bolt securing one of the cutters broke; the cutter came off the machine and a portion of the bolt struck him in the eye, inflicting a serious injury.

The guard fitted by the plaintiff, and which was on the machine at the time of the accident, was a spring guard [as shown in fig. 69, Safety Pamphlet No. 8, Woodworking Machinery Regulations], known as a Shaw guard. That guard covered the aperture on the machine on the operator's side, and one of its advantages was that it exerted pressure on the wood and so enabled the operator to keep his fingers away from danger. In general, the type of guard used on a wood-cutting machine was determined by the particular work to be performed, and the Shaw guard was widely used on the type of machine in question, in particular when the operation was on a small section of straight wood. Although it was the most effective guard in preventing the operator from coming into contact with the cutters, the Shaw guard gave little protection against broken pieces of the machinery flying out, a danger against which a cage guard was more effective; but the danger of an operator being injured by pieces of machinery flying out was more remote than that of his being injured by coming into contact with the cutters.

The plaintiff brought this action for damages for personal injuries against the defendant, alleging that the injury to his eye was due to negligence and/or breach of statutory duty by the defendant in that the defendant failed to provide and maintain a safe system of work or to comply with section 60 of the Factories Act, 1937. In particular the plaintiff alleged that the defendant failed to guard the machine in accordance with section 14 [1] of the Factories Act, 1937, and regulation 17 [2] of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922 to 1945.

December 19: HAVERS J. stated the facts and continued: On page 7 of the Safety Hints pamphlet it is stated: "Work done "on the spindle moulding machine varies so much that no single "guard can be relied upon to give the operator security on every "job. Many satisfactory guards are available, but the best "guard for one job does not necessarily give complete protection "for other kinds of work." That statement seems to me to be amply justified by the evidence which has been called before me. I find that the type of guard to be used is determined by the particular job which the operator has to perform, and I think that is why regulation 17 does not specifically describe the exact type of guard for vertical spindle moulding machines, as it does in the case of similar machines, and that it is for that reason that the regulation uses more general language and says that "the cutter of every vertical spindle moulding machine shall "when practicable be provided with the most efficient guard "having regard to the nature of the work which is being per-"formed." Regulation 18 says: "For such work as cannot be "performed with an efficient guard for the cutter, the wood "being moulded at a vertical spindle moulding machine, shall, "if practicable, be held in a jig or holder of such construction as "to reduce as far as possible the risk of accident to the worker." I find that where a machine of this type is going to operate upon a small section of straight wood, the Shaw guard, or a guard of similar type, is the most effective guard.

[His Lordship considered the various types of guard in use in the trade and continued:] I do not feel able to express any opinion whether any guard would be completely effective to protect the operator from a flying cutter. If a cutter is likely to fly off a machine going at 4,500 revolutions a minute, I really do not know what sort of guard would be required to prevent that, but I think that a cage guard might do so, and would protect the operator from flying pieces if a part of the machine, such as a nut or a bolt, breaks.

At the time when this accident happened the machine was not on load; it was merely being operated for a test which was being made for the balance of the cutter. I have to consider, therefore, the position about the guards in those circumstances. It seems to me that there is little, if anything, to choose between the Shaw guard and the cage guard in such circumstances. It is not necessary to exert pressure, as there is no wood on which the machine is being operated, and this advantage of the Shaw guard over the cage guard, therefore, disappears. From the point of view of convenience, the Shaw guard is more suitable, because the operator may require to adjust the cutters, and also because, as soon as the test for balance is over, the practice is to make a test run on the wood, and for that I think the Shaw guard would be the most effective guard. Of course, the advantage still remains of its completely covering up the aperture on the operator's side. So that while the machine is running purely for the purpose of making a test of the balance of the cutters, it is enough for me to say that I am not satisfied that the Shaw guard is not the most effective to protect the operator from coming into contact with the cutters. If, however, I have to take the possibility of the danger from both the two sources into account, namely, the risk of flying fragments being ejected from the machine and the danger of the operator coming into contact with the cutters, the danger of the operator coming into contact with the cutters is still very great even if a test for balance only is being made; whereas the danger from being injured by a fragment of a broken part of the machine seems to me to be very remote. For these reasons, I am not satisfied that the Shaw guard is not the most effective guard in the circumstances.

I turn now to consider the case which is brought on section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and the Woodworking Machinery Regulations. In Miller v. William Boothman & Sons Ltd.[10] the

DICKSON v. FLACK.

Havers J.

Court of Appeal held that regulations, such as these Woodworking Regulations, modify the strict and absolute obligation which is imposed on the occupier of a factory under section 14 (1) and substitute a code for the duty imposed by that section. In view of that decision, Mr. McIntyre, for the plaintiff, conceded that he could not rest his case on section 14 (1) of the Act, but that he must rely on the regulation, though he reserved to himself, in case this case reaches the House of Lords, the right to argue that Miller v. William Boothman & Sons Ltd.[10] was wrongly decided. Miller v. William Boothman & Sons Ltd.[10] was considered in the House of Lords in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton),[11] but that case was decided on another ground, and the House of Lords neither expressed approval nor disapproval of the decision in Miller v. William Boothman & Sons Ltd.[12] On that point, therefore, I am clearly bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal.

My attention was called to certain authorities, and the first one in order of date was Hindle v. Birtwistle,[13] a case of a flying spindle. The headnote reads: "The occupier of a cotton factory "was summoned under the above section for neglecting to fence "the shuttles of his looms. It appeared that shuttles do occa- "sionally in the process of weaving fly out from the bed upon "which they slide to and fro (called the shuttle-race) under "circumstances which render them dangerous to any persons "who happen to be in the line of flight. The flying out of the "shuttles may be caused by the negligence of the weaver in "charge of the machine, or by reason of some foreign substance "getting accidentally into the shuttle-race, or by defect in the "yarn:—Held, that the obligation to fence under the above "section was not confined to machinery which was dangerous in "itself in the ordinary course of careful working; and that the "shuttles, even though not in themselves defective, were "'dangerous parts of the machinery' if any of the above- "mentioned causes of their flying out of the shuttle-race were "likely to occur with any degree of frequency."

Wills J. said[14]: "This case is one of considerable import- "ance, but the enactment seems to be plain and intelligible, and "I feel no difficulty in construing it. The learned recorder has "supplied us with the keynote of his judgment in one sentence, in "which he says that 'the manufacturer is only responsible for "'machinery which is in itself dangerous in the ordinary course "'of careful working.' He seems to think that no machinery "can be said to be dangerous unless it is dangerous in itself, "however carefully worked. I entirely disagree with such an "interpretation, and think that it would limit most materially "a very beneficial Act of Parliament. It seems to me that "machinery or parts of machinery is and are dangerous if in the " ordinary course of human affairs danger may be reasonably " anticipated from the use of them without protection. No doubt " it would be impossible to say that because an accident had " happened once therefore the machinery was dangerous. On the " other hand, it is equally out of the question to say that " machinery cannot be dangerous unless it is so in the course of " careful working. In considering whether machinery is dan- " gerous, the contingency of carelessness on the part of the " workman in charge of it, and the frequency with which that " contingency is likely to arise, are matters that must be taken " into consideration. It is entirely a question of degree. As the " recorder has not dealt with the matter from that point of view, " the case must go back to him for reconsideration." Wright J. said [15]: " It seems to me that the chances that the workmen " will be negligent, that foreign material will get in, or that the " yarn may be of bad quality, must all be taken into considera- " tion. The mere fact that the shuttle will sometimes fly out, " and that when it flies out it is dangerous, is not enough. It " is a question of degree and of fact in all cases whether the " tendency to fly out is a tendency to fly out often enough to " satisfy a reasonable interpretation of the word ' dangerous.' "

Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co.[16] was a decision of Hilbery J. on the interpretation of the very regulation which I have to interpret, regulation 17. The headnote is: " The plain- " tiff, who was employed as a press operator at the defendants' " woodworking factory, was at work at his machine when a " piece of the cutter of the machine next to his, which was a " spindle moulding machine, broke away, flew out of its holder " and struck and injured him. The spindle moulding machine " had a guard of the type usually provided for such machines, " but it was proved that it would have been possible to provide " a guard which would probably have prevented the injury to " the plaintiff: Held, that the defendants' duty was to fence " the machines in their factory in accordance with the Wood- " working Machinery Regulations, 1922, and that they had " failed to discharge that duty; that those regulations ought " not to be construed as made only for the protection of workers " at their particular machines; and that the plaintiff was en- " titled to damages." Hilbery J. said [17]: " The question that " then remains is whether or not the plaintiff has established " a breach of these regulations. Regulation 17 requires the " provision for the machine in question of the most efficient " guard having regard to the nature of the work being per- " formed. It was proved that there was a known form of cage " guard which would have fenced the major part of the " circumference of a circle round the vertical spindle with a " wire-mesh screen, and that the work in hand could have been "performed with that guard in position. Such a guard is in "fact the subject of an illustration in the Safety Pamphlet "No. 8 issued by the Home Office. It was further clear from "the evidence that the so-called ring guard employed at the "time was only a guard against certain dangers to which the "worker at the machine would be exposed if it were not there; "but there was no evidence that it was 'the most efficient "'guard.' When asked whether it was, the expert called for "the defendants replied that it was a 'usual' form of guard "for such a machine. On balance I think it is established that "the plaintiff probably would not have sustained his injury if "the regulation had been complied with."

That case is not so helpful to me as it might otherwise have been, because, first, the point which was taken by Mr. Jukes before me was not taken before Hilbery J., and, secondly, the decision of the House of Lords in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton), Ld.[18] had not then been given. The headnote to the last-mentioned case [18] is as follows: "The appellant, while operating "a circular saw belonging to her employers, the respondents, "was injured through a piece of wood flying out of the machine "which was fenced so as to comply with the requirements of "the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, which by "section 150 of the Act were to be deemed to have been made "under that Act. Held, that the respondents were not in "breach of any statutory obligation, since the obligation to fence "imposed by section 14 (1) was an obligation to guard against "contact with any dangerous part of a machine and not to "guard against dangerous materials ejected from it, a matter "depending solely on the making of regulations under the dis-"cretionary power conferred by section 14 (3) on the Secretary "of State and not exercised by him."

Lord Thankerton, who delivered the leading opinion, summarized the matter in this way [19]: "My Lords, on consideration "of the terms of section 14, I am of opinion that there is a "simple answer to the contention of the appellant, namely, "that the obligation to fence imposed by subsection 1 is an "obligation to provide a guard against contact with any dan-"gerous part of a machine, and that it does not impose any "obligation to guard against dangerous materials or articles "ejected from the machine in motion, that matter depending "solely on the making of regulations by the Secretary of State "under the discretionary power conferred on him by the last "paragraph of this section. This view appears to be amply "confirmed by the language used." He then considered the other subsection, and said [20]: "I will only add that if sub-"section (1) was intended to include fencing against the ejection "of materials or articles, I would not expect to have two "separate provisions for the making of regulations, or to have

[20] Ibid. at p. 500.

" the second one in a separate general paragraph at the end " of the section, instead of in a subsection of its own, for the " last paragraph of the section is clearly not part of subsection " (3). It being admitted that no regulations have been made " under the last paragraph of section 14, I am of opinion that " there is no obligation imposed by section 14 on the respondents " as regards these flying bits of wood, and therefore they are " not in breach of any statutory obligation, and the appellant's " main contention fails." Then he said he was not going to express any opinion on Miller's case.[21]

Lord Macmillan came to the same conclusion. He said[22]: " They observed and indeed more than observed all the require- " ments of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, " under the Act for the fencing of circular saws. But the " fencing did not prevent a fragment of wood flying off while " the saw was working. Was it the statutory duty of the " respondents so to fence the saw as to prevent this possibility ? " In my opinion the statute imposes no such duty." He said that no regulation had been made under subsection (3) and continued: " No such regulations have been made and in the " absence of any such regulations there is no statutory duty " to fence materials or articles which are dangerous while in " motion in a machine." Lord Wright came to the same conclusion, and Lord Simonds said[23]: " The fence is intended to " keep the worker out, not to keep the machine or its product " in."

I was also referred to Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ld.,[24] which was a decision on the interpretation of section 13 (1) of the Act. The headnote to that case is: " The require- " ment of section 13 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, that ' every " ' part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced ' " imposes on occupiers of factories a duty to erect a barricade " to prevent any employee from making contact with the " machinery, and does not in ordinary cases oblige them to " erect an enclosure to prevent broken machinery from flying " out and injuring him. Quære whether, in the case of a " machine which in working might be expected to throw off " loose or broken parts, there might be an obligation to fence " it for the purpose of protecting the workman against that " danger." That quære is largely due to certain dicta of Lord du Parcq. Lord Porter said[25]: " In my opinion, it is not " necessary for your Lordships to consider in respect of any of " these cases how far the facts support the decision: the " principle is plain. Any risk arising from the working of a " dangerous machine must be guarded against under section 14 " and any danger emanating from the working of transmission " machinery must likewise be guarded against under section 13.

DICKSON v. FLACK.

Havers J.

"The working of transmission machinery is deemed to be dangerous; other machines need not be fenced unless they, or some part, are in fact dangerous. But in neither case does the Act aim at protection against breakage. In the present instance it was, no doubt, the duty of the respondents to fence the transmission machinery. That part, however, which a workman could enter upon was securely fenced and the belt was in such a position as to be as safe as it would be if securely fenced unless it broke. Had it been in such a position that the workman could come into contact with it, it would not have been so safe and in that case it would have been necessary to fence it. Fencing, in my opinion, means the erection of a barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with the machine, not an enclosure to prevent broken machinery from flying out."

Lord du Parcq agreed with the opinion of Lord Porter and of Lord Normand; he said [26]: "I wish to add, however, that, while I agree with Lord Normand that the words 'securely 'fenced' must be given the same meaning in each of the three sections (sections 12, 13 and 14), I think that they may well mean 'so fenced as to give security from such dangers as may be reasonably expected.' If machines exist, or are hereafter invented and used, which are dangerous because fragments or loose parts of the machinery are sometimes ejected from them, then I am not prepared to say that section 14 does not require such machines to be fenced for the purpose of protecting workmen against that danger. If the dictum of my noble and learned friend Lord Simonds in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ld.[27] is to be understood as meaning that such a machine need not be fenced, I respectfully doubt its accuracy, and must reserve my opinion upon it." Lord Jowitt did not dissent from the views of the other noble Lords; he said [28] "I should desire to leave open for further consideration the question which Lord du Parcq raises in his opinion."

It is interesting to note that Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co.[29] is referred to by several of their Lordships in their opinions, but none of them expressed any opinion one way or the other about the correctness of that decision, because they said that it was a decision upon a regulation in different language from the section which they were called upon to consider, and therefore they did not offer any opinion about it. Lord Normand took the same view; he said [30]: "In Harrison v. Metropolitan Plywood Co.[31] the plaintiff, who was injured when a piece of the cutter of a spindle moulding machine broke away, flew out of its holder and struck him, was held entitled to recover damages because the defendants had been

" in breach of an obligation to fence under a regulation the " wording of which is not identical with that of the Act. The " point taken by the respondents in the present case that there " is no obligation to fence against parts of a machine which " break and fly off was not taken. It is not necessary to con- " sider whether that case was rightly decided, and I have " already reserved my opinion on the effect of section 14 in " relation to cases resembling it."

I now turn to consider the particular regulation. The Woodworking and Machinery Regulations were made in pursuance of section 79 of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901; they were preserved by section 159 of the present Act and are deemed to be made and have effect as if made under section 60 of the Factories Act, 1937. It will be observed that these regulations apply to certain particular types of machines. " Woodworking " machine " is defined as " a circular saw, plain band saw, " planing machine, vertical spindle moulding machine or chain " mortising machine operating on wood." The first nine regulations are of a general character applying to all these woodworking machines. Regulation 10 prescribes in detail the way in which a circular saw is to be fenced. Regulation 11 makes a further provision with regard to a circular saw which is fed by hand, saying that a suitable push-stick must be kept available. Regulation 12 deals with a plain band saw, and again prescribes with some particularity the way in which a plain band saw is to be guarded. Regulation 13 deals with a planing machine, and regulation 15 again prescribes the particular type of guard which is to be used for a planing machine. Regulation 16 deals with the feed roller of planing machines.

Then comes regulation 17, and the difference in the language employed is very marked. It does not prescribe in any detail the type of guard which is to be used for a vertical spindle moulding machine. It uses much more general language, saying: " The cutter of every vertical spindle moulding machine " shall when practicable be provided with the most efficient " guard having regard to the nature of the work which is being " performed." Regulation 18 deals with cases where work cannot be performed with an efficient guard for the cutter, and regulation 19 deals with the suitable spike or push-stick for this type of machinery. Regulation 20 deals with the chain of a chain mortising machine, and says that it " shall be pro- " vided with a guard which shall enclose the cutters as far as " practicable." Then regulation 21 prescribes generally, saying that " the guards and other appliances required by these regula- " tions shall be maintained in an efficient state and shall be " constantly kept in position while the machinery is in motion, " except when, owing to the nature of the work being done, " the use of the guards or appliances is rendered impracticable. " The guards shall be so adjusted as to enable the work to be " carried on without unnecessary risk." Regulation 22 states that "Regulations 10, 12, 15 and 16 shall not apply to any "woodworking machine in respect of which it can be shown "that other safeguards are provided and maintained which "render the machine equally safe as it would be if guarded "in the manner prescribed by these regulations." Regulation 23 imposes a duty on the persons employed on the woodworking machines to "use and maintain" these guards and other appliances.

DICKSON v. FLACK.

HAVERS J.

The only actual decision on this particular regulation is Harrison v. The Metropolitan Plywood Co.,[32] and, as I have already said, that case was decided before Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ld.[33] and Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ld.[34] I need hardly say that I pay the greatest respect to the decision of Hilbery J., and, if the point taken by Mr. Jukes before me had been taken before him and he had had also the advantage or reading the above-mentioned decisions of the House of Lords, I should have felt inclined to follow him. But it seems to me that as the point was not taken, his decision has not the weight which otherwise it would have, and I feel that I am bound to make up my own mind on this question.

When the regulations specify in detail the guard which has to be used on a particular machine it seems clear that that specific guard, and nothing else, must be provided in order to comply with the regulation, subject only to what is said in regulation 22. On the other hand, if that specific type of guard is fitted and, notwithstanding that, a fragment or part of a machine flies out and injures the operator, it seems to me that the operator in such a case would have no right of action on the ground of a breach of the regulation. Nor would he under section 14, because of the decision in Miller v. Wm. Boothman & Sons.[35] Where the regulations do not specify in detail the particular guard to be provided, but where they use more general language as we find in regulation 17, namely, that the cutter is to be "provided with the most efficient guard having regard to "the nature of the work which is being performed," if there is any ambiguity I think that I am entitled to have regard to the general object of section 14 (1) of the Act as interpreted by the House of Lords. It has to be observed that the regulation specifies the cutters as being part of the machine which is to be provided with a guard. The regulation does not require that the machine as a whole is to be provided with a guard; nor does it require that the spindle or any other part of the machine which may throw off a detached or broken part is to be provided with a guard.

The conclusion, therefore, to which I have come is that the object of regulation 17 is to prevent any employee from making contact with the cutters. In considering, therefore, what is the most efficient guard I have to decide what is the most efficient guard for the purpose of preventing any employee from making contact with the cutters having regard to the nature of the work which is being performed. On that interpretation, and in the light of the facts that I have found, I hold that a breach of regulation 17 has not been proved. It follows also that I am not satisfied that the plaintiff's accident and injury was caused by a breach of that regulation.

[His Lordship having considered the plaintiff's other heads of claim found that the accident to the plaintiff was not caused by any negligence at common law or failure to observe a safe system of work and gave judgment for the defendant.]

Arbitration—Contract—Appeal from award—Notice to be given within 14 days—Notice deemed to be received not later than 24 hours after posting—Letter incorrectly addressed—Delivery out of time—Whether notice deemed to have been received within time.

Jurisdiction—Obtaining of an award a condition precedent to right to sue in respect of claim arising out of contract—Action for a declaration that award valid and conclusive—Action in substance to enforce award—Right of appeal from award in issue—Issue concerning jurisdiction of arbitrator—Jurisdiction of court—Arbitration Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 27), s. 25 (4).

The plaintiffs contracted to buy, and the defendants to sell, a quantity of wheat by a contract incorporating the terms of Form No. 41 (Rye Terms) of the London Corn Trade Association Ltd., which provided that all disputes arising out of the contract should be referred to arbitration and that should any party be dissatisfied with an award a right of appeal should lie to the Committee of Appeal provided that within 14 days of the date of the award notice that appeal had been claimed was given by the appellant to the other party, "notices under this rule to be given in writing, "and sent by post to . . . the place where the . . . company to "whom they are addressed is carrying on . . . business, and shall be "deemed to have been received not later than 24 hours after the same "are so sent . . ." The contract also contained a clause whereby the parties expressly agreed that the obtaining of an award "shall be "a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to "sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract . . ."

A dispute arose over the performance of the contract which was referred to arbitration, and on July 30, 1952, an award was made in favour of the plaintiffs. On August 12, 1952, the defendants posted a letter giving notice of appeal to the plaintiffs. The letter was addressed to the plaintiffs by name at an address in a town where they carried on business, but the street and number given in the address were in fact those of another company with a similar name carrying on business in the same town. That company received the letter and forwarded it to the plaintiffs but it did not reach the plaintiffs until after the expiry of 14 days from the date of the award.

The plaintiffs contended that the award dated July 30, 1952, was conclusive and final. The defendants contended that they had a right of appeal. In an action by the plaintiffs for declarations that the award was valid and final and that the Appeal Committee had no power to entertain an appeal, the defendants contended (1) that, as the notice had been addressed to the plaintiffs at the town where they carried on business and that notice had been posted on August 12, it must be deemed to have been received within 24 hours of its posting the conditions of appeal had been complied with, and (2) that the plaintiffs were precluded by the terms of the contract from pursuing the action unless and until an award had been obtained on those matters in issue:—

Held, first, that the deeming clause for receipt within 24 hours only covered a notice sent out properly addressed; that, although an address might be a little inadequate, where a notice was posted with a wrong or misleading address, so that the chances of its being received in the ordinary course of post were remote, it could not be said that it was from the outset a proper notice which must be deemed to have been received within the contractual period and, therefore, the conditions which alone entitled an appeal to be pursued had not been complied with.

Held, secondly, that although in its particular form the action was for a declaration, in substance it was to enforce an award which had been obtained; that that award was not something arising out of the contract, but had been obtained by reason of the arbitration proceedings and gave a separate right to the plaintiffs; and that, as the arbitration clause in its terms only made the obtaining of an award a condition precedent to the right to sue in respect of a claim arising out of the contract, the jurisdiction of the court in the matter in issue was not ousted. The plaintiffs, accordingly, were entitled to the declarations sought.

Unless it was clear from the contract that the parties intended to refer to arbitration matters which went to the jurisdiction of arbitrators, an arbitration clause would not oust the jurisdiction of the court concerning those matters, and where an application was made for a stay of proceedings on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction and that the dispute should be referred to arbitration, and the circumstances were such that it could be foreseen that if a stay was granted the arbitrators' findings would be referred to the court for decision, the court, if it had a discretion, would be reluctant to grant such a stay.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs were a trading corporation incorporated under the laws of Germany. Their principal place of business was at Duisberg, Germany, and they had a branch establishment at Niedenau 59, Frankfurt am Main, Germany. By an agreement in writing entered into on November 17, 1950, the plaintiffs agreed to buy, and the defendants, who carried on business in Buenos Aires, to sell, a quantity of River Plate wheat. The agreement provided that the contract should incorporate and be subject to the London Corn Trade Association Ltd. contract No. 41 (Rye terms), which contained provisions for arbitration in London, and provided, among other things, as follows: "Buyer "and seller agree that for the purpose of proceedings either "legal or by arbitration, this contract shall be deemed to have "been made in England, and to be performed there, . . . and "the courts of England or arbitrators appointed in England ". . . shall, . . . have exclusive jurisdiction over all disputes "which may arise under this contract. Such disputes shall be "settled according to the law of England . . . . Any party to "this contract . . . shall, for the purposes of proceedings at "law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or "carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade "Association Ltd. . . . The service of proceedings upon any "such party by leaving the same at the office of the London "Corn Trade Association Ltd. together with the posting of a "copy of such proceedings to his address abroad . . . shall be "deemed good service. . . ."

1952

The contract further provided: "All disputes . . . arising "out of this contract, including any question of law appearing "in the proceedings . . . shall be referred to arbitration, accor-"ding to the arbitration rule endorsed hereon . . . . Neither "buyer, seller, . . . nor any . . . person claiming under either "of them, shall bring any action against the other of them "in respect of any such dispute until such dispute has been "settled by arbitrators or by the Committee of Appeal, . . . "and it is expressly agreed that the obtaining of an award from "either tribunal . . . shall be a condition precedent to the right "of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any "claim arising out of this contract . . . . The arbitration to be "held in London."

By rule 11 of the contract: "Arbitration. All disputes "from time to time arising out of this contract shall be referred "to two arbitrators, . . . or to an umpire to be appointed by "the arbitrators if . . . they disagree. . . .

"Appeal. In case any party to an award shall be dissatis-"fied with the award a right of appeal shall lie to the "Committee of Appeal . . . provided the following conditions "are complied with: . . . Notices under this rule to be given in "writing, and sent by post to, or left at the place where the "person, firm or company to whom they are addressed is carry-"ing on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) is to "be considered as carrying on business, and shall be deemed " to have been received not later than 24 hours after the same " are so sent or left."

A claim by the plaintiffs against the defendants arising out of the performance of the contract was submitted to arbitration in accordance with the terms of the contract. The arbitrators disagreed, and they appointed an umpire who, on July 30, 1952, by an award in writing awarded, on a finding that the defendants were in default under the contract, that they should pay to the plaintiffs $ (U.S.) 195,750. On August 11, 1952, the defendants' agents notified the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association Ld. by letter that they had received instructions to give notice of appeal against the umpire's award. On August 11, 1952, the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association Ld. wrote to the plaintiffs at their Duisberg address notifying them of the defendants' appeal against the award of July 30, 1952. The defendants received that letter on August 13, 1952.

On August 12, 1952, the defendants from Buenos Aires wrote to the plaintiffs giving notice that on August 11, 1952, they had given notice of appeal against the award to the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association Ld. The letter was addressed to the plaintiffs by name at Friedrich-Ebert Strasse, 27, Frankfurt am Main, and was posted in Paris on August 12 in an envelope similarly addressed. That was not in fact the address of the plaintiffs' branch office in Frankfurt, but was the address of another company with a similar name. That company received the letter on August 14, and forwarded it by post to the plaintiffs' office at Niedenau 59, Frankfurt, where it was received on August 15. On the same day it was forwarded to the plaintiffs' main office at Duisberg, where it was received on August 16, 1952.

The plaintiffs contended that the dispatch of the letter of August 12 did not constitute a compliance with condition (c) of the conditions of appeal contained in the contract in that it was not sent to them at the offices of the London Corn Trade Association Ld.; alternatively, that it was not addressed to them at their place of business nor was it received by them within 14 consecutive days of the date of the award, and they claimed declarations that the award dated July 30, 1952, was valid, final and conclusive in the circumstances; that the defendants had no right to prosecute an appeal from the award; and that the Appeal Committee had no power to hear or entertain any appeal from the award, or to vary or reverse it. They further claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from prosecuting an appeal.

The defendants contended that they had complied with the conditions of the contract in respect to appeal; that the notice must be deemed to have been received 24 hours after the posting of their letter of August 12, 1952; alternatively, that by forwarding the letter the recipients became the agents of the plaintiffs. They also contended that the matters in issue in the action were disputes arising out of the contract, and therefore the plaintiffs were precluded by the condition precedent clause in the contract from maintaining the action unless and until an award was obtained from abitrators or an umpire.

SELLERS J. The plaintiffs in this action were the buyers and the defendants were the sellers of a quantity of River Plate wheat under a contract entered into between the parties on November 17, 1950. That contract was brought about through the agency of one Franz Hagen in Hamburg, acting on behalf of both parties. The plaintiffs were transacting their business from Duisberg, in Germany, and the defendants were in Buenos Aires. The contract was made subject to the London Corn Trade Association Ld. contract No. 41 (Rye terms) London arbitration. That well-known contract is, I apprehend, not infrequently used throughout the world by parties contracting with regard to the sale of grain. Because of that, this contract has some terms which seem to be unusually complicated, but are no doubt present in order to cater for the use of this contract by people who are resident abroad.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The plaintiffs have taken up the attitude that the Appeals Tribunal is not entitled to proceed with the hearing of the appeal, which is in the nature of a rehearing or a further arbitration, because they have no jurisdiction so to do, and the Appeals Committee have very properly decided not to proceed with the appeal pending the decision of this court on the matter. To prevent the Appeals Committee from proceeding the plaintiffs have instituted these proceedings, in which they claim that they are entitled to a declaration that the award is valid and subsisting, final and conclusive, and to a further declaration that the defendants have no right to appeal. There is an application also for an injunction with which I need not deal at the moment.

The question arises whether the award in favour of the plaintiffs is enforceable as it stands or whether it is subject to the appeal which the defendants seek to prosecute. I think both parties agree that the right of an appeal from the award of the arbitrators arises only from the contract. This not being a question of law which can be referred to the court, but a question relating to the merits of the matter on the contract of sale which has been entered into, the rights of appeal are derived solely from the contract between the parties. Those rights are set out in some detail in the latter part of the conditions and rules of the contract of the London Corn Trade Association, Ld. contract No. 41. The provision for appeal is stated to be as follows: "In any arbitration proceedings under these rules the arbitrators "may order that there shall be included in the sum awarded "for any breach of contract interest at such rate as they think "fit on the whole or any part of the damages and for the whole "or any part of the period between the date of the breach of "contract and the date of the award. In case any party to an "award shall be dissatisfied with the award a right of appeal "shall lie to the Committee of Appeal elected for that purpose "in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London "Corn Trade Association Ld. in force at the date of the contract, "provided the following conditions are complied with." Then there are set out four conditions which have been described, and I think rightly, as conditions precedent or conditions essential to be fulfilled before the right to appeal lies.

The first condition relates to the payment of the costs of the award. That has been done in this case and therefore no question arises on it. The second one; (b), requires that notice claiming appeal shall be given to the secretary of the Association within 14 consecutive days from the date of the award. That, likewise, has been done and the appropriate amount of £52 10s. has been lodged. No question arises under (b). The requirement in (d) is as follows: "When the appeal is lodged by an intermediate party, "such party shall state whether he appeals as a buyer or seller." Nothing turns on that here.

The matter which has given rise to the whole controversy is condition (c), which reads as follows: "Within the said 14 "consecutive days, notice that the appeal has been claimed is "given by the appellant direct to his seller or buyer, as the case "may be." It has been submitted here that notice that appeal has been claimed has not been given by the appellant, that is, by the sellers, to the successful party under the award as is required by the provision. When looking at the period of time during which the notice has to be given, there has to be read a further provision, which appears right at the foot of this very detailed set of rules and conditions: "Notices under this rule to "be given in writing, and sent by post to, or left at the place "where the person, firm, or company to whom they are addressed "is carrying on or (by reason of the provisions of the contract) "is to be considered as carrying on business, and shall be deemed "to have been received not later than 24 hours after the same "are so sent or left." The rule referred to is rule 11, which deals with arbitration and occupies about half of the back page of the contract, from which I have read only a small extract relating to appeals. In considering this provision in relation to the vital one, namely, (c), the question which arises for immediate consideration is: what is the effect of those two together, and, applying them to this contract, by what time had the notice to be given?

Fourteen days from the date of the award I find would have expired at midnight on August 13/14. The question arises: what is the effect of the provision that the notice "shall be "deemed to have been received not later than 24 hours after "the same has been so sent or left." That particular provision is not without its ambiguities and its difficulties. It would appear to me that the notice, to be effective, should be actually received by the party who had to receive it within the period specified, that is, within the 14 days. The notice should therefore have been received by the plaintiffs on or before midnight on August 13. If it were left, instead of posted, then one would have thought that it could have been left at any time right up to midnight on that day. If it is posted, then the provision that it shall be deemed to have been received not later than 24 hours after it had been sent would seem to indicate that a posting 24 hours before the time of expiry of the period when notice had to be given would be a good compliance with the provision whether the document was actually received or not; that is, that where posting was utilized, to post up to midnight on the 12th would be adequate whether or not the document was in fact delivered on the following day, because it is deemed to have been received during the following 24 hours. That is how I would construe it so far as this case is concerned. Whether the position with regard to being received 24 hours after it had been left would extend it beyond the 14 days as I have described them to finish here I do not know. I should have thought not. But it does add a little more complication to construing this particular clause.

Therefore, to comply strictly with this requirement, the notice must either have been received or deemed to have been received, under the provisions which I have read, before midnight on August 13. It is necessary to see whether that has been done. The notice which was given to the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association was clearly in time and was in every way a proper notice, and one which clearly indicated that the defendants were seeking to invoke these provisions and take the matter to the Appeals Tribunal. That intention is likewise apparent from their letter of August 12, 1952, but unfortunately that letter did not reach the hands of the plaintiffs before the material date as I have defined it. It was posted on August 12, and, if the posting of it can be regarded as sufficient, that is, if it can be deemed to have been received within 24 hours afterwards, then that would be a complete compliance with the requirements of the contract. For myself, I would have been prepared to find that, if this notice had been sent to the plaintiffs at Frankfurt am Main, the provision deeming its receipt within 24 hours would have been effective. The plaintiffs are a well-known company who could have been discovered in Frankfurt, and I think that that would have been an adequate address.

The problem which arises is whether it can be regarded as adequate and whether the defendants can rely on the deeming clause when in fact the notice which they sent out was wrongly addressed. This is a real misfortune and, as regards any merits, is really all that there is in this case. There was an unfortunate slip, by whoever was responsible for putting the address on the letter, in confusing the plaintiffs with another company in Frankfurt. The other company, as it happened, had almost, but not quite, an identical name. The clerk or typist who was looking for the address of the plaintiffs in Frankfurt must, because of the similarity in names, have got the wrong address. The letter went forth addressed to a street in Frankfurt where the other company carried on business, and, therefore, there was a little delay, not very long, but enough to carry the actual receipt of the letter over the vital date for notice to be given to the other side.

With real reluctance and regret, because I think that is a most excusable error and there has been no prejudice whatsoever to the other side, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot regard this letter in those circumstances as an adequate notice. The deeming clause for receipt within 24 hours can, I think, only cover a notice which was sent out with the proper address. I do not think it can be redeemed from every fault. An address might be a little inadequate—that is why I said that "Frankfurt am Main" might be enough—but when a notice is sent out with a wrong and misleading address so that the chances of it being received in the ordinary course of post are remote, I do not think I could say that that was from the outset a proper notice which must be deemed to be received within the contractual time. I say that with regret, because I think that it is quite apparent that before the time had expired information had been given to the plaintiffs that the appeal had been launched; they knew all about it, and all that they would have known if they had in fact received this or any other letter within the time. The point which is taken is purely technical, and the facts reveal no sort of prejudice to them at all by the oversight. If they had had this letter they would have been in no better or no worse position than they were in fact, and the appeal could then have proceeded in the ordinary way.

That letter failing to be a compliance with the provisions in (c) of the appeal clauses, the defendants next rely on a letter of August 11, sent by the secretary of the London Corn Trade Association Ld., to the plaintiffs in Duisberg, Germany, notifying them of the defendants' appeal and stating clearly at that stage, August 11, that they had appealed against an award dated July 30, 1952. That letter was received on August 13 and gave all the information required, from any practical business point of view, but it was not the actual letter which was sent out by the defendants. The defendants seek to say that that is a sufficient compliance with the rule. The objection which is taken to that, on behalf of the plaintiffs, is that it is not, as is required by clause (c) of the appeal clauses in the contract, a notice given by the defendants, the sellers, direct to the plaintiffs, the buyers, and is not a notice by them at all. It is alleged by the defendants that the letter was written by the secretary as agent for them, following receipt of the notification of appeal from their agents.

I was shown a form, which appears to be a common form which is no doubt rightly sent out, intimating not only to the other side, but to the arbitrators as well, that notice of appeal has been given, but there is nothing in the rules about it. Attractive in some ways as the defendants' argument is, I do not feel that I can find that when the secretary sent this letter he was either acting as, or purporting to act as, the agent for the defendants. There is no indication that they in any way ratified his letter, except, by their pleadings, when they came to court, and I do not think that that can be regarded as a compliance with provision (c). The provisions are contractual terms and, whilst one is tempted to give reasonable business latitude to them, they have to be complied with. This is really a minor obligation, the major requirement being that notice of appeal shall be given to the secretary, but if there is a requirement, the fact that notice has been given to the Association but not communicated direct to the other party does not alter the position—that notice to the other party still has to be given, and I do not find it to have been given here. On those grounds, on my reluctant interpretation of the facts here, there has been no compliance with one of the essential provisions giving the basis for an appeal to the Appeals Committee.

If the above submission on behalf of the plaintiffs was not successful, it was argued that there was a fundamental error in these letters to which I have referred, whether it be the one from the defendants or the one from the secretary of the Association; they were addressed, it was said, the one improperly merely to a branch of the plaintiffs in Frankfurt, and the other to their main office in Duisberg, when the contract required that any such notice as was requisite under these provisions should be addressed to the plaintiffs at the London Corn Trade Association Ltd. That submission is derived from the clause which states that notices under the rule must be "in writing, and sent by post to, or left at the place where, "the . . . company to whom they are addressed is carrying on "or . . . is to be considered as carrying on business." It is said that under the provisions of the contract the place where the plaintiffs, being a German and a foreign company, carry on business is at the address of the London Corn Trade Association in London, and that all such notices as I am concerned with in this case should be addressed to them at that address.

That submission is based on provisions in the contract which are to be found, oddly enough, under a long series of sentences or paragraphs which have no description placed against them, as all the other paragraphs seem to have, as to their subject-matter. The most convenient reference to make in regard to them is that they are the sentences or paragraphs which come under "Brokerage." They have nothing to do with brokerage. Perhaps it would be most convenient to call them the unnamed paragraphs. They provide: "Buyer and seller agree that, for "the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, this "contract shall be deemed to have been made in England, and "to be performed there, any correspondence in reference to "the offer, the acceptance, the place of payment or otherwise "notwithstanding, and the courts of England or arbitrators "appointed in England, as the case may be, shall, except for "the purpose of enforcing any award made in pursuance of "the arbitration clause hereof, have exclusive jurisdiction over "all disputes which may arise under this contract. Such dis-"putes shall be settled according to the law of England "whatever the domicile, residence, or place of business of the "parties to this contract may be or become. Any party to this "contract residing or carrying on business elsewhere than in "England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of proceedings at "law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily resident or "carrying on business at the office of the London Corn Trade "Association Ld., and if in Scotland, he shall be held to have "prorogated jurisdiction against himself to the English courts, "or if in Northern Ireland to have submitted to the jurisdiction, "and to be bound by the decision of the English courts."

It is submitted that that is a clear provision that any party to this contract who resides outside England and Wales shall, for the purposes of proceedings at law or arbitration, be considered to be ordinarily resident or carrying on business at the London Corn Trade Association office. That clause, so far as I have read it, refers substantially to the law of the contract, which is to be English law, and the form of any dispute, which is to be England, either the courts of England or the arbitration. That is emphasized by the further provision that those who are outside England and those who may be in Scotland or in Ireland, shall be treated as being resident in England.

Counsel submitted that the effect of that is that when a party is called upon to give the appropriate notice under the appeal provisions, where by reason of the provisions of the contract a party is to be considered as carrying on business in London at the London Corn Trade Association office, that is where the notice should be given. I can see no reason for that, and it does not seem to me at all desirable, if it can be avoided, that that should be enforced. I think nothing would be better and more satisfactory in the interests of everybody than that, if the party who is seeking an appeal so desires, he should give notice direct to the actual place of business of the person who is concerned on the other side of the appeal. It would be quite unreasonable to say that, if he does that, he is wrong and that he should have done something not nearly as good, namely, sent his notice to the office of the London Corn Trade Association, without apparently there being any regular recognized procedure for their transmitting any such notice directly to the party concerned. Happily, although I find the whole of the provisions which I have to consider far from clear, I do not so construe this contract.

It may be difficult, as a matter of construction, in the part which I have just read relating to the law of the country and the proceedings by way of arbitration, to substitute the word "may" for "shall be considered" in some circumstances. But the passage at the end of that clause—that notice sent to the office of the London Corn Trade Association address should be deemed good service—would seem to lend some support for the construction that, where this provision says, "any party "to this contract residing or carrying on business elsewhere "than in England or Wales, shall, for the purposes of pro-"ceedings at law or in arbitration, be considered as ordinarily "resident or carrying on business at the office of the London "Corn Trade Association Limited," the word "shall" can be construed as "may be considered as ordinarily resident," but I do not think that that is altogether an easy construction. I am prepared to hold, although having regard to my other finding it does not become strictly relevant here, that under the last provision with regard to notice in writing there are two alternatives: the appellant can either give notice at the address where the other party is carrying on business, or, if he so desires, can utilize the provision and give notice at the office of the London Corn Trade Association in an appropriate case. I think, on the whole, that that is the best way of dealing with these rather obscure provisions, regrettably obscure, since the vital matter of appeal ought to be so perfectly clear to ordinary people engaged in this trade that no mistake could arise about it. I was pleased to hear that there was some prospect of this being altered in the near future.

If I be wrong in that construction, it seems to me that this is a provision which exists for the benefit of the party who has to give a notice to a foreign party who may be quite inaccessible, and I should hold that it is a provision which could have been waived by the defendants in this case, if they wished, and that they could have given notice direct to the buyer that they were proposing to appeal: if the buyer had received a direct notice, I would not entertain a submission on his behalf that, although he knew all about it and had a direct notice, it was not a fulfilment of the conditions because it was not sent to the London Corn Trade Association office. I am happy to think that I have not to come to that very unfortunate and nonsensical conclusion.

In the circumstances, as I find the facts here and in the light of the other matters which I have considered, I am not in a position to find that notice under (c) has been given. Therefore it has not been established that the conditions which alone entitled an appeal to be pursued have been complied with. I have come to that conclusion and I have expressed it, although on one view of this case it was suggested that I ought not to express my opinion on these matters, but that I should leave for the consideration of the arbitrators, who, it was submitted, alone can deal with such an issue as has arisen before me. Counsel on behalf of the defendants, not without some apology, but recognizing that the claim of the plaintiffs was really nothing more than seeking to take advantage of an unfortunate slip and had no merits other than the highly technical point on the contract, sought to counter it by taking another point which was, perhaps, no less technical than that with which he was opposed.

It was submitted that, if the view which I have expressed is right, nevertheless I cannot give effect to it because of the provisions with regard to arbitration in the contract, and that there is here a requirement that there should be an award on such a matter as is in issue before me as a condition precedent to the right of bringing the matter to the court; in other words, as it is sometimes put, that there is here a Scott v. Avery clause which ousts the jurisdiction of the court, and that I must give effect to that and say that this proceeding in front of me is misconceived. Again, this is a point which is by no means easy of solution, but I have formed a view about it, which I propose to express, although I shall have to do so in the circumstances in somewhat brief form.

The provisions in the contract which are relied on are to be found towards the end of this unnamed set of clauses to which I have already referred; they are as follows: " All disputes from " time to time arising out of this contract, including any question " of law appearing in the proceedings, whether arising between " the parties hereto, or between one of the parties hereto and the " trustee in bankruptcy of the other party, shall be referred to " arbitration, according to the arbitration rule indorsed hereon

" and this stipulation may be a rule on any of the Divisions of " His Majesty's High Court of Justice in Northern Ireland, on " the application of either contracting party, for the purpose " of enforcing an award against a party residing or carrying on " business in Northern Ireland. Neither buyer, seller, trustee " in bankruptcy, nor any other person claiming under either of " them, shall bring any action against the other of them in respect " of any such dispute until such dispute has been settled by " arbitrators, or by the Committee of Appeal, as the case may " be, and it is expressly agreed that the obtaining of an award " from either tribunal, as the case may be, shall be a condition " precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the " other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract." Then at the end of that paragraph it says: " The arbitration to be held in London."

It becomes material to consider the claim in this action; it is for a declaration that the award of July 30, is a valid award and is final and conclusive between the parties, and for another declaration that the Appeals Tribunal of the London Corn Trade Association Ld. has no right to hear the appeal. Although in its particular form the action is for a declaration, an award has been obtained, and is binding unless it is to be subject to an appeal, there being no other complaint against it. The claim in this action is, in substance, to enforce that award, and the award is not something which arises out of the contract. It is something which has been achieved by reason of the arbitration proceedings and gives a separate and distinct right to the party who has obtained the award in his favour. I think that that is a sufficient answer to the defendants' technical claim that this is a matter which cannot be considered by this court because it is only a dispute arising out of the contract which is subject to arbitration between the parties. The arbitration clause in its terms only makes the obtaining of an award a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other if it is sued in respect of a claim arising out of the contract, but for the reasons I have just given and as I understand this case, I do not regard the plaintiffs' claim as a claim arising out of the contract.

A broader issue, however, discussed before me, was whether what was in issue here was a matter for arbitration at all; it was said that the jurisdiction of the Appeals Tribunal is in question and that the law is clear that arbitrators or an arbitration tribunal cannot decide their own jurisdiction, but that that is a matter essentially for the court. A number of authorities were relied on. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on the well-known case in the House of Lords of Heyman and another v. Darwins Ld.,[13] and in particular on some remarks of Lord Parker in Produce Brokers Company Ld. v. Olympia Oil and Cake Co. Ld.[14] He also referred to Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Kelly and Others,[15] before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In that case Lord Parmoor who delivered the judgment of the Board said[16]: "Whenever there is a difference of opinion between the parties "as to the authority conferred on an umpire under an agreed "submission, the decision rests ultimately with the court and "not with the umpire." Lord Parmoor cited Produce Brokers Co. v. Olympia Oil and Cake Co.[17] and said: "It would be "impossible to allow an umpire to arrogate to himself jurisdiction "over a question which, on the true construction of the sub-"mission, was not referred to him. An umpire cannot widen "the area of his jurisdiction by holding, contrary to the fact, "that the matter which he affects to decide is within the "submission of the parties." He then sought to apply that to the facts of that case. I was also referred to Hirji Mulji v. Cheong Yue Steamship Co. Ld.,[18] where Lord Sumner referred[19] to May v. Mills.[20]

That is a formidable array of authority to support the proposition that, where jurisdiction arises, as here, the matter is essentially for the court and not for the arbitrator. If it were that the Appeals Tribunal was being called on here to adjudicate on its own jurisdiction, I think that that submission would be unanswerable and that it would be a matter for the court, but the position here is rather different. I do not say that the result is different, because I do not propose to decide it, but here the arbitration has taken place on the merits of this case and an award has been given. The contract itself, and the contract only, provides the circumstances of an appeal and sets out the require-ments. It is not the appellate tribunal which, on the submission of the defendants, would have to decide whether it had jurisdiction or not, that is, whether all these requirements have been complied with, but the arbitrators appointed in accordance with the provisions of the contract. That does make the position somewhat different. But it does not seem to me that that is of much practical importance because, if either party wish to say that this is a matter which must go for arbitration, their appro-priate course would be to apply to the court to stay the action which had been brought. If they applied for a stay the court would have to adjudicate on the matter in its discretion, and subject to the Scott v. Avery clause, as to whether it was an appropriate case in which to grant a stay or not. The issues which would come to the court if the arbitrators were to decide this matter would be entirely issues on questions of law, and, I apprehend, if a stay was asked for, that the court would be reluctant to grant it because, if I made an order now that this court had no jurisdiction to hear this matter or could not give effect to its decision because of the arbitration clause, all that would happen is that, if the matter continued, it would go to the arbitrators, who would make a decision and then their findings, being so wrapped up with law, if not entirely a question of law, would come back to the court for decision. If that were the position then the court would not normally grant a stay where it had a discretion.

Taking the view that I do, that this condition precedent clause only applies to a claim and would not apply to such an issue as that, it would be in the discretion of the court to say whether effect should be given to the arbitration clause or not. I think that that is all I will say about this rather difficult and vexed question, but it does seem to me that there are to be found here and there observations which might support the view that arbitration would prevail where in a contract it was abundantly clear that there would be referred to arbitration matters which were of the type which have been indicated here which go to jurisdiction. On the other hand, there is the authority to which I referred which makes it clear that, unless it is clear from the contract that the parties had intended to refer the actual matter of what may generally be called jurisdiction to an arbitrator, the jurisdiction of the court prevails.

One other question was raised, namely, that, notwithstanding that there is in this contract an arbitration clause that an award is a condition precedent to a right to sue or to recover, the court has power to remove that clause or to treat it as non-existent. Reliance was placed on section 25 (4) of the Arbitration Act, 1950, which has been repeated from the previous Act and which provides as follows: "Where it is provided (whether by means "of a provision in the arbitration agreement or otherwise) that "an award under an arbitration agreement shall be a condition "precedent to the bringing of an action with respect to any "matter to which the agreement applies, the High Court, if "it orders (whether under this section or under any other enact-"ment) that the agreement shall cease to have effect as regards "any particular dispute, may further order that the provision "making an award a condition precedent to the bringing of an "action shall also cease to have effect as regards that dispute."

I have found that the condition precedent clause does not assist the defendants to this action. It is only if I had found otherwise that the plaintiffs would wish to rely on that provision, but perhaps I ought to give some indication of what my discretion would be if I felt empowered to utilize that section. The submission was supported by an authority of the Court of Appeal, Dennehy v. Bellamy,[21] where the section in the previous Act was under consideration in relation to a claim under an insurance policy, and where the plaintiff brought an action relying on the effect of the Third Parties (Rights against Insurers) Act, 1930. The Court of Appeal made some observations which were wide in their terms and which may have at some time to be considered in relation to the section as a whole in other circumstances. I am inclined to think that the power of the court to exercise a discretion under that section is one which would arise in the circumstances which are set out at p. 80 of the 15th edition of Russell on Arbitration and in those circumstances only, and that it is not a wide unlimited discretion. It is there stated: "There is power to make such an "order: (1) Where the authority of an arbitrator or arbitrators "or umpire is revoked by leave of the court. This would seem "to cover any case where either the Scott v. Avery clause is "contained in a submission proper, and leave is given to revoke "this, or it is contained in an agreement to submit and leave "is given to revoke a submission made pursuant to the agree-"ment. (2) Where the whole arbitral tribunal is removed by the "court: that is, for misconduct or delay. (3) Where the dispute "involves charges of fraud."

If it is limited to these matters, then I do not think that I would have discretion in this case to make that clause ineffective. Since another view may be taken of that, and it is a matter of discretion for the trial judge, I think that I have a very difficult decision to make, because, as I have already indicated, the plaintiffs here are taking advantage of a very slight error occasioned merely by a slip without any prejudice to them at all, because they had full knowledge of this appeal well within the 14 days. I would not, therefore, be inclined to grant any indulgence to them and exercise a discretion in their favour, acting, I apprehend, on the most judicial basis. On the other hand, if I had the power to give effect to this section and did not do so the position would only be that which I have indicated, that the matter would have to be adjudicated upon by the arbitrators and eventually come back to the court; that would be very unsatisfactory and in itself would be strong ground for not exercising discretion in the other way.

On the whole, although I hold the views which I have expressed with regard to the plaintiffs, if I had a discretion under section 25 (4) I would exercise it and let the matter be decided once and for all by the court. Indeed, it may be that Mr. Roche is right in his submission that, notwithstanding the rather complicated circumstances of this contract and the fact that the matter arises after one award and is relevant to the appeal, this being a question of jurisdiction the cases are strong enough to require the court or entitle the court in its own jurisdiction to deal with it to the exclusion of the arbitrators.

In those circumstances I find that this action is successful, that the plaintiffs are entitled to their declaration that the award is valid and is final and conclusive, and I am prepared to grant the second declaration that the defendants have in the circumstances no right to prosecute an appeal from the award to the London Corn Trade Association Appeal Committee.

Railway—Fencing—Cattle killed on line—Calves separated from dams—Exceptional force used to break through fence—Whether dams "strayed"—Trespass—Train derailed—Cost of repairs to train and track as damages—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 68.

Calves were separated from their dams and penned to the north of a railway line while the herd was confined to the south thereof. During the ensuing night the dams, anxious to rejoin their calves, broke down the railway fence, which was in good repair and as strong as an ordinary farm fence, and three were killed by a train, which was derailed by the impact. On a claim by the owner of the cattle which were killed for their value, alleging a breach of section 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, in respect of the railway fencing, the Railway Executive counterclaimed for damages for cattle trespass.

Held, applying the dictum of Bramwell B. in Child v. Hearn (1874) L.R. 9 Ex. 176, and distinguishing Bessant v. Great Western Railway (1860) 8 C.B.(N.S.) 368, that the Railway Executive were not in breach of section 68, and that they succeeded on the claim and the counterclaim, damages being assessed as the cost of repairs to the train and the track.

ACTION.

In the early morning of October 11, 1951, 12 of a large herd of Aberdeen Angus cattle belonging to the plaintiff, a farmer, through whose land the main Portsmouth railway line ran, broke down the railway fence and got on to the railway line, and three of them were killed by a passing train. The accident caused a derailment of the train. The value of the beasts was agreed at £60 apiece, and the plaintiff claimed £180 damages, alleging that the defendants, the Railway Executive, were in breach of their statutory duty to maintain a proper fence as provided by section 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The defendants denied liability and counterclaimed for a sum of rather more than £300 for the expenses and consequences of the derailment.

1952

COOPER v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

A. Lyell for the plaintiff.
E. S. Fay for the defendants.

DEVLIN J. Under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 68, a railway company—whose duties and obligations are now taken over by the Railway Executive—is under an obligation to make and maintain "sufficient posts, rails . . . or "other fences for separating the land taken for the use of the "railway from the adjoining lands not taken, and protecting such "lands from trespass, or the cattle of the owners or occupiers "thereof from straying thereout. . . ." The Railway Executive therefore are under a duty to fence so as to keep cattle off the railway.

The plaintiff contends that they failed to erect and maintain a proper fence and accordingly sues for breach of this statutory duty. If the fence was defective, then there can be no doubt—and it is not otherwise disputed—that the claim succeeds and the counterclaim fails. If, on the other hand, the fence was not defective, then it is agreed that the plaintiff has no answer to an action for trespass. His beasts got on somebody else's land, and under the law of cattle trespass there is a strict liability on the owner of beasts not to let them go on somebody else's land. It is only if he can show that there was a duty on the owner of the land—that is the Railway Executive—to keep a proper fence and that they failed to do so that he can resist that claim in trespass. It is conceded that if he has no answer to a claim for cattle trespass the damages which flow from it, and which are recoverable by the Railway Executive, are all the damages which they have sustained as a direct consequence of the derailment; and subject to a few minor points that arise on the figures, there is no dispute about what that sum would be.

Thus, the only question which I have to determine is whether or not the fence which was erected at this place was a proper fence within the meaning of the statute. Prima facie, if cattle get on to a railway line the presumption would be, in the absence of some satisfactory explanation, that the fence which was supposed to have kept them off could not have been doing its duty. It is therefore necessary, before I consider the condition of the fence itself, to go a little into the history of the matter to see how it came about that cattle were on the railway line in the early morning of October 11, 1951.

The plaintiff's Aberdeen Angus herd consists of about 180 beasts, and they are allowed, as is no doubt quite common with beef herds, to run in the fields. They calve in the fields and they suckle their calves in the fields, and apart, I suppose, from a little feeding in the winter, they find all their feed in the fields. In those circumstances they are not much accustomed to being handled. They are not brought into the farm buildings, except occasionally for grading and sending to market those which are considered suitable, and for the castrating of any bull calves which have been born during the period.

The plaintiff's land, as I said, is divided by the railway, and communication between the two parts is secured by means of an occupation crossing and a cattle creep. The two run side by side across the railway, being separated from each other by about 30 ft. The cattle creep is simply a sort of tunnel underneath the railway through which the cattle can go. The herd is kept in fields on the south side of the railway—the farm building being on the north side—and ordinarily the plaintiff does not rely simply on the railway fence for keeping the herd off the railway; it is put in some fields beyond that adjoining the railway and which in themselves are fenced in.

This case is concerned only with the fence on the south side of the railway, and only with a short piece of fencing, 30 ft. in length, which runs between the occupation crossing and the cattle creep. The fence is broken, so to speak, by a gate leading into the occupation crossing and the gate leading into the cattle creep. And there is a short length of fence, therefore, in the 30 ft. which supports those two gates. The fence consists of concrete posts let into the ground at a distance of some 2½ ft. or 3 ft. with chain link fencing secured by three runner wires, one at the bottom, one at the top and one in the middle, and on top of that there are three or four straining wires which keep the posts in position. In this 30 ft. length there are two end or corner posts, which take the strain and which therefore have struts let into the ground which support the straining posts; and in between there are three centre posts. It was through the fourth or westernmost partition, in this fence that the cattle got in the morning of October 11. What they had done was to dig out and knock down the strut which supported the corner post, then they had pushed up the netting which was secured to the middle posts by a " U " pin, and had been able, without breaking the runner wires, to push up the netting and so get underneath the netting and make their way on to the railway.

[His lordship referred to the evidence of employees of the defendants that on the day before the incident the length of fence in question was in good condition, and continued:] The round-up of the plaintiff's herd took place on that day, October 10, and ordinarily what happens is that the herd is brought in, the grading takes place, and those calves which have to be castrated are separated and castrated and then they rejoin the herd, so that the whole herd goes back to its ordinary pastures before the end of the day. What happened on this occasion was rather different, and it was so because the round-up was not started as early as it should have been. An appointment had been made with the vet. to attend at 11 o'clock, as presumably it was intended that the castration should take place then. The round-up having started late, when he came he found they were not ready for the castration; it was thought that the other business of grading should take place first, and accordingly it was arranged the vet. should go away and come back the following morning at 11 o'clock and do the castration then, the arrangement being that the calves—there turned out to be about 27 of them—which needed to be castrated were to be penned in the farm buildings overnight and then would be taken back to rejoin the herd on the next day. That meant, of course, that the herd had to spend the night in two parts, and the evidence shows that that division is likely to cause agitation and excitement in the herd, mainly, I think, to those dams which were separated from their calves, particularly those separated from the young calves. But of course under the conditions in which they are kept calves had been sucking the dams, it may be, right up to the point when the next calf comes. It is also said that excitement would be caused by the mere fact of splitting a herd which is accustomed to run together. There is no doubt that for one or both of those reasons—and I think principally the separation of the calves from the dams—there was a great deal of disturbance during that night. The calves were penned in the farm buildings; their bellowing could be heard by the dams who were just the other side of the railway line, not very far away. The main part of the herd was not put into its usual place behind the other fence which I mentioned, which would have been an additional protection to the railway fence. They were right up against the railway fence. The mothers could hear their calves and they, or the herd generally, were bellowing all through the night.

COOPER v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

I am satisfied there was a considerable amount of excitement in the herd; whether it amounted to frenzy, as some of the witnesses said, I do not know, and I do not think that it very much matters. It was, however, in that condition that the herd did what I am satisfied under ordinary conditions the beasts would not have done, namely, broke through this fence. I think that the fair inference is—though one cannot be precise about the time—that they did not find their way on to the railway line until fairly early in the morning. The accident occurred to a train at 4.45 a.m. There had been trains running on the ordinary electric service up to 1 a.m. that morning, and there had been steam trains which went in between, and the probability therefore is the cattle had not been on the line long before the accident took place. Twelve of them got through in this place, and I am satisfied that this was the only place where they did break through.

It is right to say that the chain link fencing—and this is a point on which the plaintiff much relies—was secured to the runner wires, and the runner wires in turn were secured to the centre posts, on the north or railway side of those posts. Had they been secured on the south side, that is to say, the field side, then the beasts pushing against the chain link would have pushed the chain link into the posts; as it was, they were pushing the chain link away from the posts. The runners which held the chain link in position were secured by " U " pins; that is, a pin with a little circle through which the wire runs, and then two long tails which go into a hole in the post and are bent on the other side so as to keep the pin in position. Some of those pins had been pulled out of the centre post by the cattle pushing against it, and in that way they had been able to lift the chain link. That covers all the facts which it is necessary for me to find.

I have now to consider whether the fence as so constructed was one which fulfilled all the obligations of the Railway Executive under the statute. I am satisfied that it was as strong as any ordinary farm fence could be to offer protection against the ordinary behaviour of cattle. Indeed, it was a great deal stronger, being made of concrete posts and having this strong chain link fencing.

Two criticisms have been made about it, first, the one to which I have already referred, that on the assumption that it was well enough constructed, nevertheless it was improperly designed because the chain link was on the middle posts, though not on the corner post, on the wrong side, and had it been on the right side it was said that this would not have happened. I am satisfied from the evidence that secured as it was by these " U " pins the chain link fencing was secured quite strongly enough to resist all what I may call the ordinary activities of cattle—any sort of animal pushing and rubbing against it. It is no doubt true that if the chain link fencing had happened in this case to have been on the other side of the posts it might have prevented the extraordinary, and, one might also say, violent, at any rate forcible behaviour of the cattle on this occasion and prevented them from getting through. But I am satisfied that, if the right test is that the fence must be strong enough to prevail against the ordinary forcible behaviour of cattle in ordinary circumstances, it was good enough for the purpose. The fact that it might have been better is not proper ground of complaint against the Railway Executive. They are not, in my judgment, obliged to provide the strongest possible fence, but only to provide a fence which is proper in the circumstances.

The other criticism is as to the condition of the fence. I have already referred to the evidence of the railway employees, who saw it shortly before October 10, that the fence was in good condition. I accept that evidence, and it therefore follows that I reject the evidence for the plaintiff with which it comes in sharp conflict.

I find that the fence was as strong as any ordinary farm fence, not merely a fence dividing fields, but a fence dividing fields from a place on to which it is highly undesirable that cattle should go; that it was as strong as that sort of fence could reasonably be expected to be, and I am satisfied that cattle behaving in a normal way would not have got through it, but only cattle using exceptional force or under unusual conditions.

COOPER v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

Devlin J.

It is contended for the plaintiff that that finding is not enough to absolve the Railway Executive from blame. It is said that the operation which had taken place that day was not in any way an improper operation; that it was not contrary to the rules of good husbandry; that a proper agricultural use was therefore being made of the field; and that there is a duty on the Railway Executive to make a fence strong enough to resist the consequences of any proper agricultural operation that may be conducted on land which adjoins the railway.

That involves a consideration of the true construction of the Act as it had been construed in the authorities. It is, of course, an absolute obligation in this sense, that the Railway Executive is absolutely bound to maintain a fence, and it is no answer to say that some accident or act of a trespasser has made the fence defective. But the question is: what is the quality of the fence which it is absolutely bound to maintain? The Act says that it is to be such a fence as will protect "the cattle of the owners or "occupiers thereof from straying thereout." It is important not to ignore those words "from straying thereout," because those are the words which give a clue to the sort of fence which the Railway Executive shall be obliged to maintain. It is protection against straying, and all the cases which have been cited to me have been cases in which the cattle have, in the ordinary sense of the word, strayed through a gap in the fence, or something of that sort.

It is not necessary for me to define exactly what is meant by "strayed," but I do not think that it could be taken to include cattle which broke through by the use of exceptional force because they were subjected to some peculiar inducement or temptation to try to get across the fence. It may well be, of course, that constant rubbing will so weaken a fence that a cow or other beast acting quite normally will ultimately break it down and stray across. But here was a fence which, I am satisfied, was in good and proper condition on the afternoon of October 10, and which was broken through in the circumstances which I have related. I do not think that cattle in those circumstances can be said to be breaking through a protection against straying.

For this purpose the matter seems to be summed up in Child v. Hearn.[1] I need not do more than read a short passage from the judgment of Bramwell B. He said[2]: "Now the fence was "not sufficient to prevent the defendant's pigs from trespassing, "and it would seem to follow that the railway company must be "liable for the consequence of the pigs escaping through it. But "it does not follow as a consequence that they would be liable "for any mischief done by any pig escaping on to the line through "a defective fence. Nor do we lay down that there must be a "fence so close and strong that no pig could push through it, or "so high that no horse or bullock could leap it. One could " scarcely tell the limits of such a requirement, for the strength " of swine is such that they would break through almost any " fence, if there were a sufficient inducement on the other side. " But the company are bound to put up such a fence that a pig " not of a peculiarly wandering disposition, not under any " excessive temptation, will not get through it." I respectfully follow that as laying down the right test of the construction of the Act, and it is the test I seek to apply.

The plaintiff relied very strongly on Bessant v. Great Western Ry.[3] That was a case in which a farmer folded sheep and lambs adjoining a railway. He made three of the sides of the fold with hurdles in the ordinary way, and he used the railway fence as the fourth side. I have said " the railway fence," but in fact it consisted only of a quickset hedge. In that case the defendants, according to the evidence as stated in the report, called several competent persons who had inspected the fence and they stated that the fence was amply sufficient for all ordinary purposes, but they all said that it was not a proper fence to rely on for the folding of sheep. The case was tried with a jury. The sheep got through a gap in the quickset hedge; I should have thought that that was the sort of hedge through which sheep would be expected to get anyway, but no doubt the risk was greater in that they were confined in a comparatively small place as a fold. However, what was held in that case was that the matter was properly left to the jury at large and that they were entitled to take the view that the operation of folding was a normal farming operation, and a normal use of the land which the railway company must foresee, and must provide a fence that was strong enough for that purpose.

I do not think that that case really decides any more than that it was a proper direction to give to the jury, that such a fence was one which the railway company were bound by the Act to make. That is not a direction which could reasonably be disputed, though it may not be one which would be very illuminating for a jury. The case came on a Rule to the full Exchequer Court[4] and his lordship said that the general direction in those terms was a perfectly proper one.

There are some dicta in the case which may go a little farther. In the present case the plaintiff relied in particular on the direction of Martin B. in the court below, which was approved in the full court. He said[5]: " The broad question is, whether " or not the fence was a sufficient fence,—was it such a fence as " the company were bound by the Act to make? " And that was a direction which was approved. Then he went on to say[6]: " It " strikes me, that, if the use to which the adjoining land is put " is such (being an ordinary use) as to render a stronger fence " necessary, it would be the duty of the company to provide it;

" and to place hurdles along it if necessary." I think that those words were merely used by way of illustration by Martin B. and that they must be read in relation to the facts of the case; in particular, to the fact that they were dealing with sheep folding rather than the ordinary use of the land, and were dealing with a fence which was no more than an ordinary quickset hedge with a gap in it. I do not think that they meant that, whenever it could be shown that the land was being used for a purpose for which a farmer might properly use it, the railway company was bound to guard against that. Were it so, the burden on the railway company would really be intolerable, because they could not be expected to find out exactly what use the farmer was going to put his land to on any particular day and to strengthen the fence, which was strong enough for all normal purposes, to meet that particular use.

Counsel for the plaintiff, feeling the difficulty of forcing the argument as far as that, said that the obligation at any rate would exist if the Railway Executive knew of the particular use, and he said that they were told of the particular use—at any rate, that they were told of the round-up—to which this land was to be put on this particular day. But the Act does not say anything about knowledge; it does not impose any duty on the farmer to tell the Railway Executive of the use he is going to make of the land or on the Railway Executive to find out. It imposes a duty to provide and maintain a fence, and the only question is: What is the quality of the fence which has to be maintained? That does not depend, I think, on the particular use which is going to be made of a particular field on a particular day. On that ground, therefore, I reject that argument.

I do not strictly find it necessary for my purposes to inquire whether the use which was being made of the land on this occasion was in conformity with good husbandry—a matter which has been debated in the course of the case. I do not find that it was an improper thing to do, in the sense that it was necessarily a wrong and careless way of carrying on a farming operation; but I think I ought to express my view on the facts on this point in case it may be material hereafter. I think that a prudent farmer who did not want to run the risk of his cattle escaping would not have conducted the operation in the way in which it was conducted on this day. To that extent it was carelessly done—if that is the right word to use. That is to say, if he owed a duty to anybody else to conduct the operation in a prudent way, I do not think that he would have fulfilled it by the way in which he conducted this operation. The view of Professor McCunn, called on behalf of the defendants, is that an ordinary farm fence is not sufficient for confining cattle under the conditions in which this herd was. That, I think, was really accepted by Mr. Gauntlett, the expert who was called on behalf of the plaintiff. Mr. Gauntlett said: " An ordinary farm fence will " not do the job when the herd is separated, but such a separation " is comparable with penning cattle for inoculation or other "purposes of that sort in a cattle crush or a cattle yard." Therefore, he said, if you put dams into an ordinary field the fence should be of extra strong construction, such as you want for a cattle crush or a cattle yard; and in effect he conceded, I think, that you should not, therefore, put cattle into the field unless you had an extra strong fence.

On a small farm there may not be such a place; they do not in the ordinary way in this country have stockades of the sort to which Professor McCunn referred, and it may be that on an ordinary farm there is not a yard large enough to hold 180 beasts; but to confine the dams, of which there would be 20 or 30, would mean splitting the herd into three. But the answer is, if the farmer has not those facilities it emphasizes the importance of conducting the whole operation on one day. I am satisfied that the whole operation could easily have been conducted on one day; that it was not so conducted was for no other reason than that it was not started earlier. Even then, I think that the calves could have been castrated on the same day, and possibly they would have been had it not been thought more convenient to do the other work of grading first.

A farmer who conducts this operation in that way and who has not any place in which he can conveniently keep the herd confined overnight is not, in my view, a prudent farmer. I think that a prudent farmer would see that the whole operation was conducted in the normal way in one day.

For these reasons I find that there was no breach of the Railway Executive's duty under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and accordingly the consequences follow which I have already indicated. There will be judgment for the defendants on the claim and on the counterclaim.

Some minor points on the amount of the first item of the counterclaim were raised; that is, the item which claims £224 for repairs to the permanent way, and I shall assess the damages under that head as £190.

Negligence—Conductor's duty on omnibus—Alighting of passengers.

Because of work being done in a street which, at night, resulted in obstructions marked by red lights, the drivers of omnibuses had been accustomed to stop for passengers to alight from and enter them at some distance short of an official stopping place. That fact was known to the plaintiff and her husband travelling in a crowded single-decker motor omnibus at night owned by the defendants, approaching this official stop, but it was not known to the driver and conductor of that particular omnibus.

After leaving the last official stopping place, the conductor shut the door, which was at the front of the bus. The plaintiff's husband told the conductor that he wanted to alight at the next stop. The conductor then rang the bell, to inform the driver that he should stop at the next stopping place, and told the plaintiff's husband to wait until the bus stopped. The driver stopped the bus some 20 to 25 yards short of the official stopping place, close to the kerb, in order that, owing to the obstructions, an oncoming vehicle might have room to pass him. The plaintiff's husband thereupon alighted from the vehicle and the plaintiff was proceeding to follow her husband when the driver, the oncoming vehicle having passed him, restarted the bus without receiving any signal. The plaintiff was thrown to the ground and received injuries. The omnibus stopped at the official stopping place, when the driver first heard of the accident. In an action alleging negligence:—

Held that, (1) the plaintiff was free from blame in alighting pursuant to the invitation of the conductor to alight when the bus stopped; (2) the driver was free from blame; and (3) the conductor was guilty of a failure of duty in that he should either (a) have prevented the plaintiff from alighting then, or (b), by warning the driver, have prevented the omnibus from restarting whilst the plaintiff was alighting. The conductor ought to have taken control of the situation and his failure to do so caused the injury.

APPEAL from a judgment of his Honour Judge Rhodes given at Leigh County Court, Lancashire, in a remitted action.

The plaintiff and her husband were passengers on the evening of Saturday, December 16, 1950, in a motor omnibus owned by the defendants. The omnibus was a single-decker, access to and egress from which was obtained from a door in front of the vehicle. The omnibus was full—all the seats were occupied and from five to eight passengers were standing in the gangway.

After leaving the last stop near the "Red Lion," Leigh, the conductor said that he closed the door of the omnibus and that the plaintiff's husband told him that he was wanting to alight at the next stop. That stop was almost opposite "Manor Arms "Hotel" in Church Street. The conductor said: "I rang the "bell and told him"—the plaintiff's husband—"to wait until "the bus stopped."

At this date a new kerb was being put down in Church Street, with the result that there were obstructions in the road, marked at night by red lights. Owing to this work in the road, it happened that omnibuses approaching the stopping place opposite the "Manor Arms Hotel" had been stopping short of that official stopping place. That fact was known to the plaintiff and her husband, but was not known to the driver and the conductor of the particular omnibus in which they were travelling.

The county court judge found that because of the obstruction in the road it was not possible or desirable for two vehicles to pass at a certain place in Church Street. As a vehicle approached him the driver stopped his omnibus some 20 to 25 yards short of the official stop and, according to the evidence of the plaintiff's husband, the omnibus was close to the kerb.

The plaintiff's husband alighted from the omnibus and the plaintiff was proceeding to follow her husband when the omnibus restarted and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and received injuries. The driver, who had stopped because of an oncoming vehicle, had restarted the omnibus without receiving any signal (except the original one, the bell to stop at the next official stop), and stopped at the permanent official stop opposite the "Manor "Arms Hotel," when he first heard of the accident.

The case for the defendants was that the omnibus had never stopped before it reached the permanent official stop, though it had slowed down to a crawl.

In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants claiming damages for negligence, his Honour found that the omnibus did in fact stop some 20 to 25 yards short of the official stopping place, that the driver of the omnibus was in no way to blame, and that there was no liability on the defendants, but he assessed the damages contingently at £180.

The plaintiff appealed.

SINGLETON L.J. I will ask Morris L.J. to give the first judgment.

MORRIS L.J. [after stating the facts]: It seems to me that once the crucial question of fact is decided as to whether the bus did or did not stop, the issue as to liability becomes very much more clear. In no sense, in my view, did the plaintiff do anything wrong. She, through her husband, had intimated her desire to get off the bus, and asked that the bus should stop at the next stopping place, and she with her husband were told by the conductor, who rang the bell at their request, to wait until the bus stopped. The bus did stop; the husband got off; the wife proceeded to do so, not unnaturally, and then the bus proceeded to move on. The conductor, being in a single-decker bus, doubtless encountered the difficulties that are inevitable when a bus is crowded, but the conductor does not say in his evidence that he did not know the position of the bus at the time of stopping; he apparently did not do anything in the way of calling out. He says that he knew that the door was closed before the bus left the "Red Lion" because he closed it, and thereafter having heard someone shout "Oh" he saw that the door was open; he apparently had not noticed anyone opening the door.

The judge, having found very definitely that the bus stopped, went on to say: "The bus stopped and the plaintiff's husband "made a genuine mistake." By that he meant that the plaintiff's husband thought that that was the stop that was being used that day by the bus in lieu of the official stop, because other buses for some time, on account of the work being done, had chosen a stop some yards away from the official stop. The judge went on: "I cannot see that the driver was in any way "to blame. He was entrusting the safety of passengers to the "conductor. It was a genuine mistake; the plaintiff has failed "to show negligence." And then he went on, contingently, to assess damages. His Honour does not appear, from the notes of the judgment which are before us, to have considered the allegation that there was negligence on the part of the conductor.

In my judgment, it is not shown that the driver in these circumstances did anything that he ought not to have done, or omitted to do anything that he should have done; but it is shown that there was a failure of duty on the part of the conductor. When the conductor said to the plaintiff's husband "Wait until "the bus stops," having been asked to ring the bell, that seemed a very clear invitation to the plaintiff and her husband to alight when the bus did stop. When the bus did stop and when it stopped short of the stopping place, the conductor, in my judgment, ought either to have warned the passengers, or ought to have communicated with the driver in some way. It would be easily possible to inform the driver that passengers were getting off the bus. The conductor ought to have taken control. It is clear that he could have seen that the plaintiff's husband had got off the bus. There were others waiting to get off. That could have been seen by the conductor. The plaintiff was following her husband. The conductor ought to have given a warning, or ought to have taken charge of the situation so as to ensure that either the plaintiff would be prevented from getting off the bus or that the bus should be prevented from going on while passengers were in the act of alighting.

We were referred by Mr. Pigot to a number of authorities. Many of the cases must depend upon their own particular facts. One of the cases cited was Mottram v. South Lancashire Transport Co.[1] In that case: "The respondent was a passenger

"on one of the appellants' trolley buses. She was following "another passenger off the bus at a request stop, at the time "when the conductress was collecting fares on the upper deck of "the bus. The other passenger rang the bell once and the bus "slowed down, but just as he was getting off, thinking he was "acting in the interest of everyone, he rang the bell twice as a "signal for the bus to proceed. The respondent proceeded to "alight after him, but, the bus picking up speed at that "moment, she was thrown to the ground and injured. In an "action for damages for such injuries, it was contended that "the conductress was negligent in not coming to the platform "as soon as she heard the bell ring once, so that she might "supervise the restarting of the bus"; and it was held that there was no negligence on the part of the conductress.

In the course of his judgment Goddard L.J. said: "After the "man had given the signal for the bus to stop, and if the bus "had stopped, it would have been the duty of the conductress "to see that no one else was getting off before giving the signal "for the bus to start again. In this case the bus never did stop. "Before it could stop, the officious passenger gave the signal for "the bus to start again."

On the facts in the present case, once the bus did stop the plaintiff was acting quite properly in alighting; she was alighting pursuant to the invitation of the conductor to alight when the bus stopped, and the conductor should thereafter have seen what was happening. He should have given some warning; he should so have directed and controlled the whole situation that the bus would not proceed to move off while another passenger was alighting from it.

I consider, therefore, that on the finding of the judge, the result should have followed that there was liability on the defendants, and that there should have been judgment against the defendants for the amount of the damages assessed by the county court judge.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion and have nothing to add.

*VAUGHAN v. VAUGHAN.

Husband and wife—Matrimonial home—Desertion by husband—Wife told she could live there for life—Subsequent divorce of husband—Right to possession of house.

A husband was the owner of a house where he lived with his wife as their matrimonial home until he left her on February 10, 1948. The wife continued to reside there, and in 1950 she obtained a decree of divorce against the husband on the ground of his adultery. After a time he brought proceedings for possession of the house, but she resisted this on the ground that he, when leaving the house, had told her that she could always live there. She claimed, therefore, that she had an irrevocable licence to live there during her life:—

Held, that after they had ceased to be husband and wife she could not justify her claim unless she could set up a contract. As it was, the statement originally made to her could, after the divorce, amount to no more than that she, as ex-wife, was entitled to remain in occupation as a bare licensee, and the licence was therefore revocable.

Per Evershed M.R.: I did not intend to lay down in Foster v. Robinson [1951] 1 K.B. 149; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 2) 120; [1950] 2 All E.R. 342, that "where a promise has been made which is not "contractual in form or effect and that promise has in fact been "acted upon, then and without more a right is given to the promisee "to go on enjoying the subject-matter of the promise indefinitely."

Per Denning L.J.: The wife ought to have protected her position by applying for maintenance in the divorce proceedings before decree absolute, and should have come to an arrangement with her husband whereby he agreed not to turn her out except by an order of the court, she agreeing to accept a reduced sum for maintenance as long as she lived there.

APPEAL from Judge Emlyn-Jones sitting at Birkenhead County Court.

The plaintiff, John E. Vaughan, was the owner of 65 Grosvenor Road, Birkenhead, where he resided as the matrimonial home with his wife, the defendant Effie M. Vaughan, until he left her on February 10, 1948. The wife continued to reside there, and she obtained in 1949 a decree of judicial separation and in 1950 a decree of divorce on the ground of the husband's adultery.

The plaintiff afterwards brought proceedings to recover possession of the house, which were resisted by the defendant on the ground that when the plaintiff left the house he had told her that she could always live there. She claimed, therefore, that she had an irrevocable licence to live there during her life, and that in the grant to her of maintenance her residence in the house was taken into account.

The county court judge said that there could be no doubt that by an irrebuttable presumption of law a wife's licence to occupy the matrimonial home was irrevocable, Bendall v. McWhirter,[1] where, however, the marriage was still in being. Denning L.J. there said [2] that when a marriage came to an end the husband's former wife became a stranger to him and the presumption of law in her favour as the wife could no longer assist her. The wife, however, could rely on her contractual licence to the extent of the terms of the contract: Errington v. Errington.[3] In the present case he would hold that the plaintiff in 1948 licensed the defendant to live in the house always, but he could not see that any consideration moved for the defendant. But a contract supported by consideration was not essential, for although the defendant could not assert it as a cause of action, yet if the licensor sought to revoke the licence he would be restrained by the court for doing so: see the observation of Evershed M.R. in Foster v. Robinson.[4] He therefore dismissed these proceedings.

The plaintiff appealed.

F. D. Paterson for the plaintiff.
W. G. Morgan for the defendant.

EVERSHED M.R. This appeal raises, in a somewhat different form from that in which it has appeared in other recent cases, a problem concerning the occupation of the former matrimonial home by a former wife. I emphasize those last three words, "a "former wife," because it is important to note in this case that the marriage between the plaintiff and the defendant was dissolved (on the wife's petition) in June, 1950. Whatever may have been her rights as regards the matrimonial home before that date and so long as she remained the plaintiff's wife, from June, 1950, onwards any rights she can assert to remain in occupation of the former matrimonial home must rest on some other basis than that of her being the wife of the proprietor of those premises. [His Lordship stated the facts.]

By the present proceedings the husband, the plaintiff, seeks to obtain an order for possession of this dwelling-house. The county court judge refused to make the order, on the ground that the statement or promise made by the plaintiff to the defendant that she could always live there gave her a right, as a licensee, under a licence not revocable by the husband, to continue, and continue indefinitely, in the premises. That view was based on certain observations of my brother Denning in Bendall v. McWhirter,[5] and again in Errington v. Errington[6]; and in the course of the citations reference is also made to certain observations of mine in Foster v. Robinson,[7] to which I will return a little later.

VAUGHAN v. VAUGHAN.
Evershed M.R.

In my judgment, and without trying to expound this subject to any greater degree than is necessary to decide this case, the wife cannot, now that the marriage has been dissolved, assert a continuing right to remain in occupation of this house unless she can at least set up some kind of contract. I do not need to pursue the question whether there should be a good consideration, but there must be something contractual—that is, a promise made, intended to have, and having, contractual effect. And when reference is made to this statement of the husband's and regard is had to the time at which it was made, it seems to me impossible to suppose that what the husband said could have been intended by him, or understood by her, to have had any contractual basis or effect. Nothing, be it observed, was said about paying rent or rates, or what was to happen about repairs. Without more, it seems to me impossible to suppose that the husband intended to bind himself and that the wife regarded herself as entitled, for the whole of her life, come what might, to remain in occupation of this house—I suppose upon terms that her husband would provide the rent and the rates and possibly provide for repairs also.

If that is right, then this promise or statement, and the subsequent conduct of the parties, which is consistent with the statement originally made, can amount to no more than that the ex-wife was entitled to remain in occupation as a bare licensee of her former husband as the proprietor of the premises. If that view is right, then the licence was clearly revocable in the eye of the law. Being revocable, and having been in fact revoked in this case, either by notice (which I understand was given in March of this year) or, failing all else, by the issue of a summons, the only question remaining is, what length of time ought to be allowed for the defendant to remove herself from the premises? For it is well settled that though a licence may be revoked the licensee is not instantaneously turned into a trespasser; he or she must be given time, reasonable in all the circumstances, in which to remove himself or herself and his or her belongings from the house in respect of which the licence operated. Upon that matter I have been much assisted by Mr. Paterson's suggestion; for he said that he would not object to four to six months being allowed to the wife. I take the larger period; and I think that though it is generous it is also not unreasonable, bearing in mind the length of time during which the defendant has in fact occupied this house.

One other thing only need I say before I suggest the form of order which should be made, and it is this. Foster v. Robinson [7] was a somewhat special case. It was one in which possession was sought not against the person who had, as it was said, become a licensee of the premises, but against his daughter. The headnote states the substance of the case thus: "Shortly

"after the end of the first world war the plaintiff took over the "management of a farm and let a cottage near-by to a man who "worked on the farm at a rent of £3 5s. 0d. a half-year. Later "the plaintiff let the farm but the tenant of the cottage continued "to work till, in 1946, he became unfit to do so by reason of age "and infirmity. The plaintiff then told him that the existing "tenancy would cease but that he could live at the cottage rent "free till he died. The tenant accepted that offer and lived in "the cottage without paying rent till he died. The defendant, "his daughter, had lived in the cottage for nine years, and, on "her father's death, she took out letters of administration of his "estate and claimed to remain on at the cottage paying the old "rent. In proceedings by the plaintiff to recover possession, "Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to possession on the "grounds that the original tenancy had, as a result of the "arrangement in 1946, been surrendered by operation of law. ". . ." It follows from that citation that the court was not concerned with the question whether the former tenant could enforce the promise made to remain rent-free at the cottage. It is no doubt true that the pre-existing tenancy could only come to an end if its place were taken by something else. Certain findings of fact had been made by the county court judge. I observe from the judgment of Singleton L.J.[8] that the county court judge had found "that from May, 1946, until his death "the father was a licensee, paying no rent, but entitled to remain "in the cottage for the rest of his life."

The passage from my own judgment on which reliance was placed in the court below is this[9]: "Since the recent decision "in Winter Garden Theatre (London), Ld. v. Millennium Pro-"ductions, Ld.[10] I think that, although a licence of that kind "may, apart from the terms of the contract, be revoked, it may "now be taken that if the landlord, having made that arrange-"ment, sought to revoke it, he would be restrained by the court "from doing so. Thus the result is arrived at that the tenant "was entitled as licensee to occupy the premises without charge "for the rest of his days, and he did so. I prefer that analysis "of the case." I did not intend to lay it down in that passage that, where a promise has been made which is not contractual in form or effect and that promise has in fact been acted upon, then and without more a right is given to the promisee to go on enjoying the subject-matter of the promise indefinitely. I have thought it right to make that explanation because I think that the county court judge in the present case may have thought that these words of mine did lead to such a conclusion; that though there was in the present case nothing contractual, still, the promise having been made, the ex-wife was entitled to assert it as a defence to any proceedings by her former husband to recover possession of his premises notwithstanding that he had in the meantime revoked the licence. I think, therefore, that in the present appeal the defence which was set up is not available to the wife, and I think that this appeal must be allowed.

Taking advantage of what Mr. Paterson has said, I think that the proper order will be that the defendant should be required to deliver up possession by June 24, 1953. That period will give her ample time to make such application as she thinks fit for a review of the order of maintenance at present operating. That she may well be entitled to obtain, for, as I understand, the sum of maintenance which the plaintiff is now paying has been calculated after making due allowance for the circumstance that the defendant was living at this house while her husband was paying not only the rent (if it is a leasehold property) but also the rates.

DENNING L.J. The county court judge seems to have thought that there was a contractual licence by the husband giving the wife the right to stay in the house for the rest of her life. If such a contractual licence were established, I would agree that the husband's claim in this action should be dismissed; but I would like to say that, in that event, the contractual licence would be a "post-nuptial settlement" within the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court, which could then decide whether or not the husband should get possession, and if so, on what terms. As I understand the law on this matter, when a husband makes a continuing provision for the future needs of his wife, in her character as a wife, which is still continuing when the marriage is dissolved, the provision is a "settlement" which can be brought before the court to see whether the provision should continue now that she has ceased to be a wife: see Smith v. Smith [11]; Gunner v. Gunner [12]; Halpern v. Halpern.[13]

The difficulty is to see that a contractual licence was established. To establish a contractual licence there must be a promise which is intended to be binding; and which is either supported by consideration, or is intended to be acted on and in fact acted on: see Dillwyn v. Llewelyn [14] and Plimmer v. Mayor of Wellington.[15] In this case I cannot interpret the promise as one which was intended to create legal relations for life. It simply expressed in words the authority which the court would presume if nothing was said, namely, that the wife had authority to stay in the house in her capacity as a wife during the marriage. It is one of the familiar cases where the express authority is co-extensive with the presumed authority and, like it, is brought to an end by death or divorce: see Bendall v. McWhirter.[16]

The result is that the wife's right to stay in the house came to an end when she divorced her husband. She ought to have protected her position by taking steps in the divorce proceedings before decree absolute. She ought to have applied in those proceedings for maintenance, and then have come to an arrangement with her husband whereby he agreed not to turn her out of the house except by an order of the court, and she in return agreed to accept a reduced sum for maintenance so long as she lived in the house. Such an arrangement would undoubtedly be sanctioned by the Divorce Court on or after making the decree and thus become binding: Bennett v. Bennett.[17] The wife here unfortunately did not protect her position in that way. Upon the decree absolute she became simply a licensee with a revocable licence to stay in the house. But she could not be turned out at once. She was entitled to have a reasonable time in which to make her arrangements; and what is a reasonable time depends on all the circumstances of the case: see Minister of Health v. Bellotti.[18] Regard must therefore be had to the history of the marriage, to the fact that these two had been married for 21 years when the husband deserted her and later committed adultery, and also to the question whether any alternative accommodation was available for the wife. Any difficulty about fixing a reasonable time in this case was, however, solved when Mr. Paterson, for the husband, very fairly said that he was prepared to allow the wife another six months. That gives her time to go to the Divorce Court and get the maintenance increased up to a sum sufficient for her to live in comparable comfort somewhere else.

In these circumstances I agree that the appeal should be allowed and an order made for possession on June 24, 1953.

ROMER L.J. I agree. If a wife was to establish a contractual right to continue to reside indefinitely in the former matrimonial home after the dissolution of the marriage, it seems to me that she would need to have much more material at her disposal than the defendant has here, because all manner of things would have to be considered as incidental to that right. My Lord has mentioned the question of repairs and rates, which, of course, would be very material matters for consideration and agreement. Then there is the question whether the wife's right should continue after her remarriage or should cease upon such remarriage; the question whether she should have powers, and, if so, what powers, of subletting or assigning; and the further question whether, supposing she went abroad for three or four years, she would be entitled to resume possession on her return.

VAUGHAN v. VAUGHAN.
Romer L.J.

Considerations of that kind would have to be considered as preliminary to the granting of a right to remain in possession of the former home. It is not suggested that any of these matters were considered between the parties in the present case.

I am satisfied that the wife is not entitled to the right which she is claiming, and I am unable, therefore, to agree with the judge when he said that the plaintiff was precluded from asserting his legal right as owner. I think that the position is as my Lord has indicated, and that, subject to reasonable notice being given, the defendant must leave the premises.

Lord Goddard C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson JJ.

Road Traffic—Motor assisted pedal cycle—Mechanically propelled vehicle—Taken without consent of owner—Pedalled without using engine—Motor cycle—No insurance or driving licence—Offences—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), ss. 1, 2, 4, 28, 35.

The defendant, who had no driving licence, took and rode away a motor assisted pedal cycle without the consent of the owner. Although the engine was in working order, he pedalled the cycle for a mile and a half along a public road without using the engine. Charges of unlawfully using a motor vehicle without a policy of insurance and of driving it without being the holder of a licence contrary to sections 35 and 4 respectively of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, were preferred against him, and he was also charged with taking and driving the vehicle away without the consent of the owner, contrary to section 28 of the Act. The justices considered that the cycle, as being used at the material time, was not a mechanically propelled vehicle within the meaning of section 1 of the Act, and they dismissed the charges. On appeal by the prosecutor:—

Held, that the words "mechanically propelled vehicles" in section 2 of the Act meant vehicles constructed so that they could be mechanically propelled; that, as a vehicle equipped to be, and capable of being, mechanically propelled, the cycle was at the material time a motor-cycle within the meaning of the Act, although the engine was not in use; that the defendant, in causing the cycle to be moved—whether by pedalling or by mechanical power was immaterial—had brought himself within the ambit of section 28 of the Act; and that, therefore, all three offences had been committed.

FLOYD v. BUSH.

CASE STATED by Lancashire justices sitting at Liverpool.

The prosecutor, a police inspector, preferred two informations against the respondent, Charles Robin Bush, charging that he, between 11.55 p.m. on May 19, 1952, and 12.45 a.m. on May 20, 1952, "unlawfully did use a certain motor vehicle, namely, a "motor assisted pedal cycle, on a . . . road . . . there not being "in force in relation to the use of the said vehicle by him such "a policy of insurance . . . as complied with the requirements "of Part II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary to section "35 . . ." of the Act, and that he "unlawfully did drive a certain "motor vehicle, namely, a motor assisted pedal cycle, on a . . . "road . . . he not being the holder of a licence, contrary to "section 4 . . ." of the Act. The prosecutor preferred a further complaint against the respondent, charging him with having on the same dates and between the same times unlawfully taken and driven away a motor assisted pedal cycle without the consent of the owner or other lawful authority, contrary to section 28 of the Act.

The following facts were proved or admitted before the justices. Between 11.55 p.m. on May 19, 1952, and 12.45 a.m. on May 20, 1952, the respondent took and rode away a motor assisted pedal cycle, the property of another person, without that person's consent. The respondent was not the holder of a driving licence as required by section 4 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, nor was there any policy of insurance in respect of third party risks complying with Part II of the Act in force in relation to the user of the cycle by him. The respondent made no attempt to start or to use the motor of the cycle, but propelled it for about a mile and a half along a public road by pedalling.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the cycle, having been used simply as a pedal cycle, was not a mechanically propelled vehicle within the meaning of section 1 [1] of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and he relied on the decision in Lawrence v. Howlett.[2] On the part of the prosecutor it was contended that Lawrence v. Howlett [2] could be distinguished in that the motor of the pedal cycle in that case was not in working order.

The justices were of the opinion that the cycle, as being used at the material time, was not a mechanically propelled vehicle within the meaning of section 1 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and they dismissed the informations and the complaint.

The prosecutor appealed.

FLOYD v. BUSH.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Lawrence v. Howlett [3] and Shimmell v. Fisher.[4]

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the county of Lancaster, before whom the respondent was charged with taking away a motor vehicle without the consent of the owner, and with unlawfully using that motor vehicle uninsured; he was also charged with driving it not being the holder of a licence.

The vehicle in question is one of those bicycles which have an auxiliary motor fitted to them so that they can at any moment be used either as a motor cycle or as a pedal cycle. The respondent took away the cycle without the consent of the owner, and when he was stopped was pedalling it. He had apparently pedalled it for a mile and a half, and had not turned on the motor. The justices, having been referred to the decision of this court in Lawrence v. Howlett,[5] were of the opinion "that the "said motor assisted pedal cycle, as being used at the material "time, was not a mechanically propelled vehicle within the "meaning of section 1 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930," and dismissed all the informations.

In the opinion of this court they were wrong in so doing, and I do not think that they really thoroughly appreciated the decision in Lawrence v. Howlett,[5] which was a case which gave this court a great deal of trouble. We came to our conclusion with some hesitation, and Gorman J.,[6] in his concurring judgment, said that it was an exceptional case and must not be taken to be in any way extended beyond its particular facts. That case also concerned one of these so-called dual purpose vehicles, but there the motor had been dismantled; "certain "vital parts—namely, the cylinder, piston and connecting rod— "had been removed by the defendant, although there was some "petrol in the tank." In other words, the defendant had dismantled his motor so that the cycle was no longer, in the opinion of the court, a mechanically propelled vehicle; that is to say, a vehicle which was capable of being propelled by mechanical power.

In this case I think that we are bound to assume from the way in which the case is stated that this was a cycle in which the auxiliary motor was in working order, because the justices appear to have applied their minds, not to the question whether the engine could have been worked, as it obviously could have been, but as to whether at the moment when the respondent was stopped he was using it as a motor cycle, or, as they put it, as a pedal cycle. The definition of motor cycles in section 2 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, is "mechanically propelled vehicles . . .

" with less than four wheels and the weight of which unladen does " not exceed 8 cwt." I think that the only sensible construction of the words " mechanically propelled vehicles " is to mean vehicles constructed so that they can be mechanically propelled, and it would be going far beyond Lawrence v. Howlett [7] if we were to hold that one of these vehicles was not a mechanically propelled vehicle. If we were so to hold, a man might at any moment let his licence lapse, or not take out a licence, and yet might start his cycle up on the road as an ordinary cycle. For these reasons, I think that Lawrence v. Howlett [7] does not apply.

In Shimmell v. Fisher [8] this court decided that any movement of a car without the consent of the owner is enough to bring the person who moves it within the ambit of section 28 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. It does not matter whether he drives it for 100 yards or a mile or two miles. If he is driving the car, that is to say, causing it to be moved without the consent of the owner, he is committing an offence. It may be that in certain cases if he were prosecuted for doing it, the justices would say that it was a trivial matter and would give an absolute discharge, but that is not the sort of case with which we are dealing here. Here is a man who, without any right, took a motor cycle, that is to say, a vehicle capable of being used as a motor cycle and equipped to be used as a motor cycle, without the consent of the owner, and drove it along the road —I say drove it, because he caused it to move—whether he caused it to move by pedalling or by mechanical power seems to me to be immaterial, because the vehicle at the material time was provided with a motor and could be used as a motor cycle.

For these reasons, I think that the case must go back to the justices with an intimation that all three offences have been proved.

CROOM-JOHNSON J. I agree. There is no finding by the justices that the mechanically propelled part of the vehicle had in any sense ceased to be in existence. The justices seem to have thought that the particular use to which the vehicle was being put by the alternative method of propulsion caused it to cease to be a mechanically propelled vehicle. Speaking for myself, but for the decision to which the justices have come, I should have thought that this was a self-evident case.

PEARSON J. I agree.

*ANGLO-IRANIAN OIL CO. LD. v. JAFFRATE AND OTHERS.†

[THE ROSE MARY.]

International Law—Expropriation without compensation—Property of foreign national—Invalidity—Application of principle by domestic tribunal—Oil concession in Iran—British company—Expropriation by Iranian Government—Sale—Oil in tanker at Aden—Claim by company—Jurisdiction of Aden court—Plea of coercion—Whether oil movable—Interest of sovereign State in oil—Plea of purchase in good faith.

By a Convention of 1933 between an English company and the Government of Persia the company were granted the exclusive right to extract oil within the territory of a specified concession in Persia. By laws of 1951, the Iranian Government purported to nationalize and expropriate all property vested in the company by the concession of 1933. Subsequently, by an action in detinue, the company claimed delivery up to them of oil from that concession contained in a tanker in Aden harbour, which had been sold by the Iranian authorities:—

Held, that the company were entitled to the oil, which remained their property, since (1) the Iranian laws of 1951 were invalid by international law, for, by them, the property of the company was expropriated without any compensation; (2) British courts treated international law as incorporated into their domestic law so far as it was not inconsistent with their own rules (per Lord Atkin in Chung Chi Cheung v. Rex [1939] A.C. 160, 168; 55 T.L.R. 184; [1938] 4 All E.R. 786); (3) the principle in *Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A. ACTION.

On June 17, 1952, the Rose Mary, flying the flag of Honduras, arrived in Aden harbour with a cargo of about 700 tons of crude oil which had been loaded at Bandar Mashur in Southern Iran. The Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. Ld. brought the present action in the Supreme Court of the Colony of Aden in detinue claiming delivery up to them of this oil, or alternatively a declaration that it was their property. The action was brought against Captain Giuseppe Jaffrate, then master, Compañia de Navegación Teresita S.A. of Panama City, Panama, the owners, and Bubenberg A.G. of Spiez, Switzerland, the charterers of the Rose Mary.

† This case is reported in the Weekly Law Reports as a reliable full report of it is unlikely to be readily available elsewhere.

ANGLO-IRANIAN OIL CO. LD. v. JAFFRATE.

The plaintiffs claimed the property in, or the immediate right to possession of, the oil by virtue of the Convention between them and the Imperial Government of Persia concluded on April 29, 1933, by which they were granted the exclusive right within the territory of a specified concession to search for and extract petroleum for a period ending on December 31, 1993. The agreement provided by article 21 that it should not be altered by legislation, and by article 22 that in the event of any disputes they were to be referred to arbitration before an umpire appointed by the President of the Permanent Court of International Justice. The oil in question, the plaintiffs said, was produced by plants established by them in the concession in Southern Iran, and this was admitted by all the defendants.

The owners of the Rose Mary refused to give possession of the cargo to the plaintiffs on the ground that the title to it was in dispute, but said that it was loaded against their instructions. The master pleaded that the Rose Mary entered Aden harbour under duress, and that accordingly the Aden court had no jurisdiction in the matter, and also claimed that the cargo belonged to the charterers.

The charterers also alleged duress, and, alternatively, relied on the Iranian laws of March and May, 1951, which purported to nationalize and expropriate as from May 1, 1951, all property vested in the plaintiffs by the concession of 1933.

Count Ettore della Zonca, managing director of Ente Petrolifero Italia Medoriente (known as E.P.I.M.), was given a power of attorney by the charterers to defend the action on their behalf. His company was originally formed to exploit Mexican oil under the name E.P.I. Mexicano after the nationalization of Mexican oil in 1939, and that the name of the company was changed in January, 1952, to E.P.I. Medoriente. On February 17, 1952, E.P.I.M. entered into a contract for the purchase in the first year of 400,000 tons of crude oil from the National Iranian Oil Company, and the charterers bought 900 tons of that oil from E.P.I.M.

Accordingly the Rose Mary was chartered on March 28, 1952, to carry the oil from the Persian Gulf to Bari in Italy, and the vessel sailed from Bari for the Persian Gulf on April 25. While in port at Bari the shipowners' broker, Mario Cosulich, with whom was Count della Zonca, delivered a sealed letter to the master with instructions that it was to be opened only at Port Said. The letter instructed the master to proceed to Bandar Mashur. The plaintiffs, learning of the intention to load at Bandar Mashur, offered to supply a cargo for the vessel at Kuwait, and she went there, but after receiving a cable in code from Count della Zonca, the master sailed from there, closed his radio, and proceeded to Bandar Mashur. There about 700 tons of crude oil were loaded, for which the master signed bills of lading in which the cargo was shown as consigned to E.P.I.M.

The shipowners, finding that they were unable to make contact with the ship, requested the plaintiffs to deliver a message by one of their tankers to the master ordering him to proceed to Aden, and the master eventually received those instructions and informed the owners that he was going to Aden. Later three R.A.F. aircraft were instructed to watch for the Rose Mary during their routine navigational training flights. The master first saw one circling overhead on June 16, and the next day an aircraft circled above the ship for some time until, 40 miles from Aden, the tug Protector came alongside with one M. Martinelli (the representative of Rose Mary's owners) on board. The Rose Mary then proceeded to Aden harbour.

Sir Hartley Shawcross Q.C., John Megaw and E. W. Nunn, for the plaintiffs, contended: (1) There was no possible case of duress; the master was ordered by the shipowners to go to Aden on a bona fide claim that the charter had been broken, and that could not amount to illegal or improper coercion. (2) The concession of 1933 gave the plaintiffs the property in or immediate right to possession of all oil derived from the concession area. (3) As regarded the Iranian nationalization laws, a municipal court would recognize their effect only if they were in accordance with international law. The English Court of Appeal cases, Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A. M. Luther Co. v. James Sagor & Co.[1] and Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz,[2] regarding Russian expropriation, were plainly distinguishable, since in both those cases the plaintiff whose property was nationalized was a subject of the nationalizing State, and, therefore, no question of breach of international law could arise. The plaintiffs relied on Wolff v. Oxholm,[3] In re Fried Krupp A.G.[4] and Republic of Peru v. Dreyfus Brothers & Co.[5] (4) The Iranian nationalization laws were a gross breach of international law since (a) the concession itself provided that it should not be terminated by any act of the Persian Government, and (b) the Iranian laws failed to provide for prompt, adequate and effective compensation, as international law required if such laws were to be valid. Numerous sources of international law to that effect included a series of notes from Secretary Cordell Hull on behalf of the United States Government to the Mexican Government after their oil expropriation: Hackworth, Digest of International Law, Vol. 3, pp. 655–62. The plaintiffs relied also on the Norwegian Ships case, in which the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague gave judgment in 1922 against the United States Government in respect of the seizure of ships, and the Chorzow Factory case decided by the Permanent Court of International Justice in 1928.

P. K. Sanghani for the first defendant, the master, contended (1) that the court had no jurisdiction on the ground (a) of duress (Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote [6] being cited), and (b) that this was really an action to test the rights of the Iranian Government, which, being a foreign government, could not be impleaded (Vavasseur v. Krupp [7] was cited); and (2) that whatever the legality of the Iranian laws in international law, the plaintiffs were estopped from contesting their validity by a letter, known as the "Middleton letter," of August 3, 1951, from his Majesty's Government, on their own behalf and on behalf of the plaintiffs, in which they had acknowledged the principle of nationalization.

A. E. Kazi, for the shipowners, maintained that they had acted in entire good faith and were quite unaware that their ship was being employed for the purpose in question.

M. A. Mansoor, for the charterers, adopted the contentions for the master on the question of jurisdiction, and contended that the concession was in respect of immovable property over which the court could have no jurisdiction (Moryan v. Russell & Sons [7a]), and that the case should not be decided in the absence of the Iranian Government. He relied on Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A. M. Luther Co. v. James Sagor & Co.[8] and Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz,[9] and contended that the nationalization laws had taken away the plaintiffs' property. He also relied on the Middleton letter, and argued that the compensation offered by the law of May 1, 1951, was adequate.

1953. January 9. CAMPBELL J. In this case the plaintiffs, the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. Ltd., have brought a claim in detinue in respect of approximately 700 tons of crude oil at present in the tanker Rose Mary lying in Aden harbour. This oil they assert is their property. They ask for an order against the first defendant, who is the master; the second defendants, Compañia de Navegación Teresita S.A., who are the owners; and the third defendants, Bubenberg A.G., who are the charterers of the Rose Mary, that they deliver up to them the oil; and in the alternative they ask for a declaration that the oil is their property.

The defences of the three defendants may briefly be summarized as follows: The defence of the first defendant is that his ship came into Aden harbour solely as a result of coercion and that this court has therefore no jurisdiction. Secondly he pleads that he had no authority to hand over the cargo to the plaintiffs. Thirdly he denies that the cargo belongs to the plaintiffs. Lastly he pleads that as the plaintiff company is not registered in Aden it cannot institute a suit here. This last plea appears to be quite untenable, was not supported by argument or authority and I reject it now.

ANGLO-IRANIAN OIL CO. LD. v. JAFFRATE.

Campbell J.

The defence of the second defendants, the owners of the ship, is that they have a lien on the cargo of oil in respect of the charter dues and should therefore not be required to hand it over to the plaintiffs.

The third defendants, the charterers, plead that this court has no jurisdiction as they claim that the ship is only in Aden harbour as a result of coercion. They deny that the plaintiffs are the owners of the cargo of oil. They deny that any cause of action has arisen in Aden. Lastly they plead that they should not be ordered to hand over the oil to the plaintiffs as they are bona fide purchasers for value.

I propose to deal first with the issue of coercion. Early in 1952, Count della Zonca, the managing director of an Italian company known as Ente Petrolifero Italia Medoriente, arranged on behalf of his firm to buy oil from the National Iranian Oil Co. (which had taken over the property and business of the plaintiffs in Persia) and contracted to sell a quantity to Bubenberg A.G., a Swiss company. He appears to have had authority to act on behalf of the Bubenberg company almost from the beginning, and arranged for them a time charter of the tanker Rose Mary with Messrs. Cosulich who were acting as agents of the owners. The charter was for the vessel to go to a port in the Persian Gulf, take on a cargo of petroleum products and then to return to Bari. Both parties agreed that the object of the proposed voyage should be kept secret, and the owners were not informed of the details of the voyage. The master, Guiseppe Jaffrate, knew of the object of the voyage, but was told to keep his knowledge to himself. He was given a sealed letter and told to open it at Port Said.

The ship sailed from Bari on April 25, 1952. On May 1, 1952, having arrived at Port Said, Jaffrate sent a letter to his owners which stated: "I beg to inform you that charterers, "Bubenberg Co., Ld., Spiez, have ordered me by letter to pro-"ceed to Bandar Mashur in order to load a cargo of crude oil "with destination to an Italian port." The reaction of the owners on receiving this letter was to write to the Bubenberg company on May 12, 1952, saying that they considered that the proposed voyage was a breach of clause 2 of the charter and warning them not to put into execution the orders given to the master. Messrs. Cosulich, who up till then appear to have acted in a somewhat equivocal manner as owners' agents, then joined forces with the owners and jointly and severally they issued a stream of letters and radio messages to Jaffrate telling him not to go to Bandar Mashur or Abadan. They told him that the charter was cancelled and to proceed to Kuwait and load another cargo there. He received another stream of messages from Bubenbergs, E.P.I.M. and Count della Zonca telling him to carry out his first orders and not to put into Aden. He did in fact go to Bandar Mashur, and on May 27, 1952, he loaded approximately 700 tons of crude oil, which it is not disputed was won from the plaintiffs' concession area. He started his return journey a few days later, and came into Aden harbour on June 17, 1952.

Jaffrate has given evidence and stated that but for coercion he would have passed Aden and gone on to Suez. He said that he was frightened by two matters: the first was the receipt of two radio messages from his owners on May 31 and June 5, 1952, threatening him with disciplinary action and legal proceedings if he refused to carry out their orders; the second was the arrival overhead on both June 16 and 17, 1952, of an R.A.F. aeroplane. On the second day the aeroplane circled round him for two hours, and he says that he thought that he might be bombarded. On the afternoon of June 17, 1952, and while 40 miles from Aden, he was met by the tug Protector, which had on board Martinelli, the owners' representative, who came on board the Rose Mary and told him to go into Aden. This he did.

Is this story of Jaffrate as to his state of mind true? In my view it is not. [His Lordship reviewed the evidence and continued:] To find that Jaffrate had decided since the beginning of June to follow the owners' instructions seems to be in accordance with the probabilities. In English law there is no doubt whatever that in a time charter the ownership and also the possession of the ship remain in the original owner through the master and crew, who continue to be his servants. It is unnecessary to give a decision as to what would be the ruling on this point where the law to be followed would be that which is applicable when a ship which is owned by a company registered in Honduras and herself registered in Panama is chartered by a Swiss company in Switzerland and sails under an Italian master from an Italian port to load a cargo from Persia. I think that there is a presumption that the English rule is universal from the very nature of a time charter. It is consistent with this time charter. It would follow, therefore, that Jaffrate would only be doing the normal and probable thing if he decided to follow the owners' and not the charterers' orders, and this is what I think in fact he did. For these reasons I find that the plea of coercion fails and does not deprive this court of jurisdiction.

The second main issue is whether or not the plaintiffs have proved that this cargo of oil is their property. They say that their title to it is by virtue of a concession granted to them by the Persian Government as the result of an agreement entered into in 1933, and which was due to expire in 1993. By article 21 of the agreement it was laid down that the concession should not be annulled by the Government and the terms therein contained should not be altered either by general or special legislation in the future, or by administrative measures, or any other acts whatever of the executive authorities.

On May 1, 1951, an Oil Nationalization Law was put into effect by the Persian Government. Although there is evidence that there was in existence another oil concession in Persia which had not produced any oil, it is not disputed that the law was passed to nationalize the plaintiff company only.

The plaintiffs contended that this Oil Nationalization Law was contrary to international law as being expropriation without compensation, and was really only confiscation, and that, as this court was bound to administer international law where it was appropriate, it should refuse to recognize any act which was contrary to international law. It must be decided, therefore, whether this expropriation was with or without compensation.

The provisions of the Oil Nationalization Law concerning the matter of compensation are articles 2 and 3. By article 2: "The "Government is bound to dispossess at once the former Anglo-"Iranian Oil Company under the supervision of the mixed board. "If the company refuses to hand over at once on the grounds of "existing claims on the Government the Government can, by "mutual agreement, deposit in the Bank Milli Iran or in any "other bank up to 25 per cent. of current revenue from the oil "after deduction of exploitation expenses in order to meet the "probable claims of the company."

It is hopeless to suggest that this, construed in its grammatical sense, is an offer to pay compensation. If it is loosely construed, and with every bias in favour of the contention of the defendants, I can only find that it consists of no more than a suggestion that at some future time the matter of compensation may be considered, and that it gives the Government power to deposit in a bank a proportion of the future profits of the expropriated business against that contingency. The proportion may apparently vary between 0 and 25 per cent. of the current revenues. By article 3: "The Government is bound to examine "the rightful claims of the Government as well as the rightful "claims of the company under the supervision of the mixed board "and to submit its suggestions to the two Houses of Parliament "in order that the same may be implemented after approval by "the two Houses." I cannot see that this is really any advance on the previous article. It says that a committee of senators and deputies shall consider the question of compensation. But the plaintiffs would have no rights even if the committee found that they were entitled to compensation, for the approval of the Houses of Parliament would then be necessary. They might approve: but they might not. A fair test to decide whether either of these two articles gives the plaintiffs any quid pro quo for having their business nationalized is to ask whether they would be any worse off if the articles had been omitted. The answer is clearly No. The plaintiffs have to rely for compensation in either case solely on the bounty of the expropriator.

Nor is the position affected by the fact that, some months after nationalization had been carried out, Dr. Mossadeq, the Persian Prime Minister, made another offer regarding compensation in a letter to Mr. Churchill dated September 24, 1952. By this time the plaintiffs had been expropriated without any compensation. If it were necessary to evaluate this new offer to see whether it could amount to what is ordinarily understood by the word "compensation," the answer must be in the negative. It first insists on an advance payment of £49,000,000 by the expropriatee to the expropriator. Then it sets out that the arbitration shall take into account (1) a calculation of any unpaid taxes owed by the plaintiffs, and (2) a calculation of what extra royalties the plaintiffs would have paid if an agreement (known as the Gass-Golshoyan agreement) which the Persian Houses of Parliament had refused to ratify had in fact been ratified. The arbitration was then excluded from taking into consideration any loss which the company would suffer after the date of nationalization by reason of having its concession shortened from 60 years to 18 years. It could only award compensation for loss of the actual property expropriated.

In discussing what is meant by the word "compensation" in relation to international law it has sometimes been said that it must be "adequate, effective and prompt." The question of adequacy may often be difficult for a court to decide, and no doubt this has caused and will cause considerable trouble in other cases in dealing with the extraterritorial effect of foreign nationalization. But here I can only find to be true the plaintiffs' contention that expropriation has taken place without any compensation and that this is confiscation.

That the courts in England will do nothing to invalidate an act of confiscation by a sovereign State of the property of its nationals is not disputed by the plaintiffs. The cases of A. M. Luther Co. v. James Sagor & Co.[10] and Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz[11] are authority for the proposition. What has to be decided is whether the reverse is true when the property confiscated is that of a non-national.

The plaintiffs' contention can be based on two grounds: first, that no State can be expected to give effect within its territorial jurisdiction to a foreign law that is contrary to its own public policy or essential principles of morality; and secondly, that a foreign law that is contrary to international law or in flagrant violation of international comity need not be regarded.

International law is the settled practice of nations. As was said by Lord Atkin in the Privy Council in Chung Chi Cheung v. Rex[12]: "The courts acknowledge the existence of a body of "rules which nations accept amongst themselves. On any "judicial issue they seek to ascertain what the relevant rule is, "and, having found it, they will treat it as incorporated into "the domestic law, so far as it is not inconsistent with rules "enacted by statutes or finally declared by their tribunals." This settled practice can be ascertained from decided cases and from the writings of jurists, and to these I now turn.

ANGLO-IRANIAN OIL CO. LD. v. JAFFRATE.

Campbell J.

The first English case cited on behalf of the plaintiffs is Wolff v. Oxholm [13] where it was held that payment to the Danish Government of a debt due to an Englishman, by virtue of a Danish order of sequestration, did not operate to discharge the Danish debtor from the claim of the English creditor. In the concluding paragraph of his judgment Lord Ellenborough said [14]: "Considering therefore, that the right of confiscating debts "contended for on the authority of these citations from Vattel "is not recognized by Grotius, and is impugned by Puffendorff "and others, that such confiscation was not general at any period "of time, and that no instance of it, except the ordinance in "question, is to be found for something more than a century, "we think our judgment would be pregnant of mischief to "future times, if we did not declare, that in our opinion this "ordinance, and the payment to the commissioners appointed "under it, do not furnish a defence to the present action; and "if they cannot do this of themselves, neither can they do so by "the aid of the proceedings in the Danish court. The parties "went into that court expecting justice, according to the then "existing laws of the country, and are not bound by the quashing "of their suit, in consequence of a subsequent ordinance, not "conformable to the usage of nations, and which, therefore, "they could not expect, nor are they or we bound to regard."

The next case is Kaufman v. Gerson.[15] A domiciled Frenchman coerced a domiciled Frenchwoman into signing a contract in France by threatening that if she refused to make the agreement he would prosecute her husband for a crime of which he was accused. The contract was valid by French law, but nevertheless an action for its breach was dismissed by the Court of Appeal. Romer L.J. held that "to enforce a contract so "procured would be to contravene what by the law of this "country is deemed an essential moral interest."

The third case is In re Fried Krupp A.G.[16] Here a German ordinance of September 30, 1914, forbade transmission of funds to Great Britain and Ireland or British colonies or foreign possessions, and provided that the date for satisfaction of claims relating to property in favour of persons or bodies situated in such areas was deemed to be postponed till further notice. It also enacted that "No interest can be claimed in respect of the period "during which the postponement continues." The court found that it was the ordinary rule of German law that such a debt would carry interest at 5 per cent. and refused to make effective the ordinance denying such interest. Younger J. said [17]: "In "that state of things it appears to me impossible that any court "in this country can recognize a German ordinance of this "description, and there is, I think, a choice of grounds on which

" refusal to do so can properly be based. It may, I think, first " of all be said that such an ordinance as this is no part of the " general German law, by which the parties to this contract alone " agreed to be bound. And even if such an ordinance must be " treated as part of that law, it may, I think, properly be held " that no such essentially one-sided development of the system " could have been within the contemplation of either party to " the contract at the time when they entered into it and agreed " that their rights thereunder were to be regulated by German " law. But, further, this ordinance, with its marked bias in " favour of German nationals as against British subjects, can, in " my opinion, create in this country no disability upon a person " against whom its provisions are directed, and the language of " Lord Ellenborough, in Wolff v. Oxholm [18] may, with the neces- " sary modifications, justly be applied to it, so far as it operates " to extinguish all German liability for conventional interest, as " being one which is not conformable to the usage of nations, and " which, therefore, Messrs. Wild could not expect, and which " neither they nor we are bound to regard. Whatever ground of " decision is chosen, it is, I think, clear that in this court Messrs. " Wild's debt carries interest unaffected by the ordinance, and " that accordingly this summons must be dismissed."

I have been referred to a number of foreign decisions. In Société Potasas Ibericas v. Nathan Bloch [19] the French Court of Cassation held that decrees of expropriation by the Government of Catalonia were invalid in France on the ground that, as no just compensation had been provided for, they were against French public policy. In Union des Républiques Socialistes Soviétiques v. Intendant Général Bourgeois Ès-qualité et Société la Ropit [20] the same court held that " although the principle that the courts " of a State faced with a juridical situation governed by foreign " legislation should apply the foreign law must be admitted, this " rule is only obligatory in so far as the application of the foreign " law and respect for the rights acquired thereby are not incom- " patible with those principles and provisions of their national " law which are held essential for ordre public." The court then proceeded to disallow the intervention of the Russian Government to get possession of merchant ships which had been nationalized and were berthed at Marseilles.

In relying on French cases, however, it must be borne in mind that the domestic law of France is very explicit regarding the right of private ownership. Article 545 of the Civil Code provides: " No one in France can be forced to give up his " property except in the public interest and in return for a fair " and prepaid compensation." [" Nul ne peut être contraint de " céder sa propriété, si ce n'est pour cause d'utilité publique, et " moyennant une juste et préalable indemnité."] The decisions in the two cases I have just mentioned actually referred to this section. But although in Aden there is no statutory enactment, so far as I know, similar to this section, it is nevertheless part of the common law. The cases therefore have some authority.

In Poland the Supreme Court in Siuta v. Guzkowski [21] refused validity to a requisition by Ukrainian troops in Poland of horses which they sold to local inhabitants. Its decision was based mainly on article 52 of the Hague Rules which forbids requisitions except for the needs of the occupying forces. Nevertheless, it is applicable here inasmuch as the principle was laid down that whether or not the Hague Rules were binding on the parties (and it would seem they were not binding on the Ukrainains, who were not recognized as belligerents) the Polish courts regarded confiscation such as this contrary to the " cardinal " principle of international custom," and if an act was contrary to international custom they would grant it no validity in Poland.

In Germany the Provincial Court of Kassel and the District Court of Waiblingen, when considering in 1947 and 1948 cases relating to the sequestration of property of Germans quâ Germans, living in Czechoslavakia, held that such sequestration was contrary to international law, and refused to recognize it. Where such property came into their jurisdiction they ordered its return to its owners. The cases are to be found in the New Juridical Weekly Review, 1947, p. 628, and the Monthly Review of German Law, 1949, p. 163, respectively. The Provincial court of Hildersheim, in a similar case to be found in the S. German Lawyers' Review, 1948, p. 143, came to a different conclusion, but gave no reasons for their decision.

In Italy the Tribunal of Florence in Lucchesi v. Malfsti [22] had to decide the subsequent ownership of a motor car which had been requisitioned by the Germans but not for the requirements of the occupying troops. They had seized it from the plaintiff and given it to the defendant on the ground that he was an invalid of the Great War. The tribunal found that the requisition was unlawful, and ordered the return of the car to its former owner. This case, like others previously mentioned, arose out of events which took place in time of war and partly depends on the law of war. But it would seem also applicable to peace time: for, if a court is willing to hold that a seizure is illegal in time of war, a fortiori it would be unwilling to recognize the same in time of peace.

I now come to the Norwegian Claims Case.[23] The Government of the United States of America had in 1917 requisitioned certain Norwegian ships. The two governments submitted the question of compensation to an arbitration tribunal under the auspices of the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague. Although compensation was the only issue, there are several observations in the award which seem relevant to the present case. It was said [24]: "The fifth amendment to the Constitution "of the United States provides: 'No person . . . shall be . . . "'deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; "'nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just "'compensation.' It is common ground that in this respect "the public law of the Parties is in complete accord with the "international public law of all civilised countries. . . . Whether "the action of the United States was lawful or not, just com-"pensation is due to the claimants under the municipal law of "the United States, as well as under the international law, based "upon the respect for private property."

In deciding what was meant by the word "compensation" in international law the tribunal said [25]: "Just compensation "implies a complete restitution of the status quo ante, based, "not upon future gains of the United States or other powers, "but upon the loss of profits of the Norwegian owners as com-"pared with other owners of similar property." Lastly it was laid down [26] that: "International law and justice are based upon "the principle of equality between States. No State can exercise "towards the citizens of another civilized State the 'power of "'eminent domain' without respecting the property of such "foreign citizens or without paying just compensation as deter-"mined by an impartial tribunal, if necessary."

In the case of the De Sabla Claim [27] the specially appointed Claims Commission inquired into the expropriation by the Government of Panama of land belonging to a national of the United States of America. In its judgment the Commission stated: "The Commission concludes that the adjudications and "the licences granted by the authorities on Bernadino constituted "wrongful acts for which the Government is responsible inter-"nationally. It is axiomatic that acts of a government in "depriving an alien of his property without compensation impose "international responsibility."

In 1938 the Government of Mexico nationalized their oil. A long correspondence then took place between the Government of Mexico and Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State of the United States. In many communications the latter contended that confiscation of the property of aliens was contrary to, and would not be recognized by, international law. He argued that confiscation did not cease to be so because there might be the express desire to pay at some time in the future. The plaintiffs invoke this correspondence in aid. They say that it is not only the opinion of the writer, but as he was then Secretary of State it is a statement of the opinion, and thus is an expression of what would be the practice, of the Government of the United States. This may well be, but it is an opinion set out when arguing a brief and as such, I think, it cannot have the weight which should be given to a judicial opinion. It has not got that salutary check upon the writer of the overhanging shadow of a Court of Appeal. But I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to invoke the dispute in their aid by reason of the fact that throughout the argument the Mexican Government do not appear to have denied the main premise of their adversary's argument. They refer to the blood of Mexico's sons shed in the revolutionary struggle, and assert that their acts were inspired by legitimate causes and the aspirations of social justice. But they do not deny the principle of compensation.

The defendants have cited Princess Paley Olgá v. Weisz [28] and A. M. Luther Co. v. James Sagor & Co.[29] as being in their favour. The first of these does no more than lay down the principle, as enunciated by Russell L.J.,[30] that "This court will "not inquire into the legality of acts done by a foreign govern- "ment against its own subjects in respect of property situate in "its own territory." It said nothing regarding property of those not its own subjects.

A.M. Luther Co. v. James Sagor & Co.[29] also concerned confiscation of property belonging to subjects of the confiscating government. It was also held that the confiscation was valid and would be upheld by the English court. The dicta in the judgments on which the defendants seek to rely are chiefly those of Scrutton L.J., who said [31]: "Should there be any government "which appropriates other people's property without compensa- "tion, the remedy appears to be to refuse to recognize it as a "sovereign state. . . . But it appears a serious breach of inter- "national comity, if a state is recognized as a sovereign indepen- "dent state, to postulate that its legislation is 'contrary to "'essential principles of justice and morality.'"

The court was considering the effect of the conduct of a sovereign State in regard to its subjects. If Scrutton L.J. had been specifically considering such conduct in regard to aliens, a far wider question of international law, I feel no confidence that he would have expressed the same opinion. His remarks were a good deal wider than necessary for the decision of the case. On the whole I think that the relevance to this case of a great part of the judgment in A. M. Luther Co. v. James Sagor & Co.[31] is more apparent than real, and that the case is in no way decisive here.

Santos v. Illidge [32] might also appear at first to favour the argument of the defendants. Here the non-delivery of slaves in Brazil under a contract made there which was lawful according to Brazilian law was held actionable in England, though the sale would have been criminal in England. The slaves were required by the defendants in Brazil after the passing of the Slave Trade Act, 1824, but before the passing of the Slave Trade Act, 1843. It would seem that the reason why the court did not refuse to entertain the claim was that no statute prohibited the holding of the slaves in Brazil, even though the purchasing of them there might be a felony in a British subject. The well-known case of James Sommersett,[33] where an escaped slave successfully sued out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that although slavery might be recognized and lawful in the colonies it was not allowed and approved of by the law of England was, therefore, not overruled.

British courts are inclined towards resting international law on practice and precedent rather than on the opinions of speculative writers, however unanimous or eminent they may be. Nevertheless I have examined the opinions of jurists on international law in such of their writings as are available here. The conclusion I arrive at is that Dicey, Oppenheim, Cheshire, Fachiri and Hackforth endorse the view that expropriation without compensation is contrary to international law. I can find no opinions to the contrary, though the defendants have referred me to Martin Wolff.

For the reasons set out above, I am satisfied that, following international law as incorporated in the domestic law of Aden, this court must refuse validity to the Persian Oil Nationalization Law in so far as it relates to nationalized property of the plaintiffs which may come within its territorial jurisdiction. I find the oil in dispute to be still the property of the plaintiffs.

The defendants urge that even if the court has come to the above general conclusion there are certain obstacles which must prevent the oil which is in the Rose Mary from being handed back to the plaintiffs. It is argued that a British court has no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the right to ownership or possession of foreign immovables. Practical considerations would make a decree concerning them ineffective. It is said that this oil must be classed as an immovable. The Aden Transfer of Property Ordinance and the Aden Documents Registration Ordinance are cited in support of this proposition. In addition I have been referred to Morgan v. Russell & Sons,[34] where an agreement had been made for a licence to remove slag and cinders from certain lands. When the licence was subsequently stopped it became a question whether or not damages could be obtained on the basis that the licence was a contract for the sale of goods under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It was held that it was not, but was a contract to grant an interest in land. The case is not applicable here, for it concerned a right to the land itself. If the dispute had related to sale of the slag after it had been taken away and put in bags there is no reason why the Sale of Goods Act should not have applied.

It is true that it can be argued that oil can be classed as an immovable. But there is nothing to show that it must necessarily be so classed. It is merely necessary or convenient to do so in certain circumstances and for certain purposes. To extend what is really only a fiction would lead to obvious absurdities. The oil in this case is clearly in the category of movables. Nor can I see that it makes any difference whether the action is in personam or in rem, though the defendants appear to attach importance to this point.

A point is taken that the amount of oil in dispute in this case is so small in relation to the total amount of oil which is known to exist in the plaintiffs' concession that this court ought not to allow itself to be used to decide what is a fictitious or at any rate no more than a test action. In Kroch v. Rossell [35] the Court of Appeal did indeed refuse to allow service out of the jurisdiction where it was satisfied in a libel action that the libels would have practically no circulation in England, but only on the Continent, and where the plaintiff had stated that he had no occupation, reputation or associations in England. They came to the conclusion that there was no question of substance to be decided. But here surely the true comparison to be made is not between the oil in the Rose Mary and that still under the ground in Persia: it is between the oil in the Rose Mary and any other oil from the plaintiffs' concession which has been sent out of Persia since its nationalization.

Again, I think that the defendant's argument must fail that the plaintiffs should have exhausted the resources of the courts of Persia before bringing this action in Aden. For the only action which they could have brought in Persia would have had to be quite different to that which they could bring in Aden. Nor is it possible to see how any action in Persia could have any chance of success. The Persian courts could say naught save that what had been done had been done in accordance with the Oil Nationalization Law. The defendants made no suggestion that the plaintiffs could have successfully pleaded that this law was invalid as being ultra vires or contrary to the Constitution.

This would appear to be a convenient point to refer to one of the pleaded defences of the third defendant that the cause of action in this case did not arise in Aden and this court has no jurisdiction. I do not know where else it did arise. The action is in detinue, and the action arises where the detention and refusal to hand over takes place. It is true that the nationalization took place in Persia. But the refusal to hand over the oil took place in Aden. The plea cannot succeed.

The next argument advanced by the defendants is that by reason of what has been referred to in this trial as the "Middleton "letter" the plaintiffs are estopped from denying the validity of the Oil Nationalization Law. The letter was written on August 3, 1951, by G. H. Middleton, H.M. Chargé d'Affaires at Teheran, to the Persian Minister of Foreign Affairs. It is not disputed by the plaintiffs that he had power to bind them by what he wrote. The material part of the letter is paragraph 3, which reads as follows: "His Majesty's Government recognize "on their own behalf and on that of the company, the principle "of the nationalization of the oil industry in Iran."

The letter was in reply to a communication known as the "Harriman formula," and the meaning of the words "the "principle of nationalization" was set out in paragraph 3 thereof which reads as follows: "By the principle of nationalization is "meant the proposal which was approved by the Special Oil "Committee of the Majlis and was confirmed by the law of "Esfand 29, 1329 (March 20, 1951) the text of which proposal "is quoted hereunder. "In the name of the prosperity of the "Iranian nation and with a view to helping secure world peace "we the undersigned propose that the oil industry of Iran be "declared as nationalized throughout all the regions of the "country without exception, that is to say, all operations for "exploration, extraction and exploitation shall be in the hands "of the Government."

It seems to me that there is a complete answer to the letter. I cannot see that a recognition that the Government should in future explore, extract and exploit the oil of the country can be stretched to mean that they were willing to be expropriated without compensation. If this had been meant, different words would surely have been used. On this finding it is unnecessary to discuss whether or not the letter, if made during active but abortive negotiations to find a settlement, was written for the sole purpose of finding a settlement and would be privileged and not binding as regards any admissions if the negotiations failed.

Finally the third defendants have pleaded in paragraph 3 of their defence: "The said cargo of oil therefore was the property "of the Imperial Iranian Government and these defendants "bought the same for valuable consideration in good faith "through the medium of E. P. I. M. (Ente Petrolifero Italia "Medoriente) and are therefore the rightful and legal owners of "the cargo in question." This defence must fail on more than one ground. Presumably the defendants wish to derive an advantage from section 23 of the Aden Sale of Goods Ordinance, cap. 121, which is a little different from the English Sale of Goods Act. The section reads as follows: "Subject to the pro-"visions of this Ordinance and of any other law for the time "being in force, where goods are sold by a person who is not the "owner thereof and who does not sell them under the authority "or with the consent of the owner, the buyer acquires no better "title to the goods than the seller had, unless the owner of the "goods is by his conduct precluded from denying the seller's "authority to sell: Provided that, where a mercantile agent is, "with the consent of the owner, in possession of the goods or of "a document of title to the goods, any sale made by him, when "acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, "shall be as valid as if he were expressly authorized by the owner "of the goods to make the same; provided that the buyer acts in "good faith and has not at the time of the contract of sale notice "that the seller has not authority to sell."

Now, even if it is accepted that E. P. I. M. are mercantile agents within the meaning of the Ordinance, they were certainly not in possession of the goods with the consent of the owner as is required by the section. If this difficulty could be surmounted a second one arises. One Arnet, who bought the oil for the Bubenberg company, has not appeared on their behalf to say that he bought the oil innocently. In view of the evidence concerning the plaintiffs' warnings throughout the world and the existence of the interim injunction of the Court of International Justice this is not surprising, and the presumption seems the other way. It seems clear that these defendants must be defeated by the proviso of section 23 "provided that the buyer acts in good faith "and has not at the time of the contract of sale noticed that the "seller has not authority to sell."

I therefore find that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in this action, and that the cargo of oil must be returned to them. A decree will issue against all three defendants to this effect as each has or had a measure of control over the cargo.

ON APPEAL FROM THE WEST AFRICAN COURT OF APPEAL.

West Africa—Immovable property—Sale by auction—Action to set aside sale—Case struck out—Application to re-list—Discretion—Relevant factors—Inadequate explanation of undue delay—Position of bona fide purchaser for value—"Balance of justice."

At a public auction sale on May 27, 1938, held pursuant to leave of the court to issue execution against land belonging to the appellant judgment debtor, the land was purchased, subject to the approval of the Governor, by the respondent. A claim by the appellant, brought within the statutory period of 21 days, to set aside the sale, was struck out by the court on July 7, 1938, on the application of the respondent, who contended that inasmuch as the Governor had not at that date approved the purchase, there had been no sale. No further proceedings were taken by the appellant until, on September 15, 1947, he moved the Supreme Court of Nigeria to re-list the suit which had been struck out on July 7, 1938. As reasons for the delay the appellant gave the death of his legal advisers, his own illness and the difficulties of ascertaining his true position in the matter. The respondent, during his occupation following the approval of the purchase by the Governor, was alleged to have removed some of the buildings on the land and rebuilt others.

The judge of the Supreme Court granted leave to re-list the suit, and on the hearing of the action found that the sale was irregular and null by reason of inadequate compliance with the court's directions relating to advertising the auction sale, and that the appellant had sustained substantial injury by reason of the irregularity. An appeal by the respondent to the West African Court of Appeal was allowed on the ground that in the exercise of his discretion the trial judge did not appear to have taken into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including such questions as to the extent of the delay in making the application to re-list the case, the reasons for the delay, the nature of the claim and the effect of granting leave on the rights of the respondent. On appeal by the appellant:—

Held, that the length of the delay, the inadequacy of the explanation of the delay, and the consequences of setting aside the sale of land as against a bona fide purchaser for value who had been in occupation of the land during the whole period of the nine years and had apparently altered the buildings thereon caused a "balance of justice" in favour of the respondent within the meaning of the dictum of Lord Blackburn in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Company (1878) 3 App.Cas. 1218, at p. 1279, and the case ought not to have been re-listed, and having been re-listed ought to have been dismissed.

JOHN OJOBO AGBEYEGBE v. FESTUS MAKENE IKOMI.

APPEAL (No. 3 of 1951) from a judgment of the West African Court of Appeal at Lagos, Nigeria (November 26, 1948), setting aside a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nigeria (April 2, 1948) whereby the Supreme Court had declared that a sale of the appellant's property in the Warri Township made by the deputy sheriff on May 27, 1938, was a nullity.

The following introductory statement is taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee. The principal issue in this appeal was whether the trial judge was right in allowing the appellant's action to set aside the aforesaid sale, which had been struck out in 1938, to be re-listed nine years later, and in deciding that the sale should be set aside or whether, as was held by the West African Court of Appeal, the judge failed to exercise his discretion judicially when he allowed the action to be re-listed, and decided that the sale should be set aside.

Section 46 of the Sheriffs and Enforcement of Judgments and Orders Ordinance (cap. 205 of the Laws of Nigeria, 1948) is as follows: "At any time within 21 days from the date of the sale "of any immovable property, application may be made to the "court to set aside the sale on the ground of any material "irregularity in the conduct of the sale, but no sale shall be set "aside on the ground of such irregularity unless the applicant "shall prove to the satisfaction of the court that he has sustained "substantial injury by reason of such irregularity."

The facts were as follows. In November, 1937, the second respondent (Amarah) brought an action against the appellant in the Warri High Court of the Protectorate of Nigeria (Warri Judicial Division) at Warri, claiming £330 for building materials and damages. Judgment was entered in his favour for £212. On December 30, 1937, the assistant judge at Warri (Jackson J.) made an order giving leave for the issue and execution of a writ of fi. fa. to issue against the appellant in respect of the land in question. The judge ordered that the sale of the judgment debtor's interest in the land should be conducted by public auction under the personal direction of the deputy sheriff and that before the auction the sale and a description of the land so put up for auction should be published in three consecutive publications in the Nigeria Gazette.

On April 1, 1938, a letter was sent on behalf of the sheriff to the Chief Secretary to the Government, Lagos, asking that the notice of that sale should be published in three consecutive publications of the Nigeria Gazette. Two only of such publications were made. The sale of the land was held by public auction at the Police Office on May 27, when it was purchased by the first respondent (Festus Makene Ikomi) for £680.

On May 31, 1938, the appellant's solicitor applied in the High Court (Warri Judicial Division) for a civil summons to set aside the aforesaid sale. The summons was issued on June 8, 1938, impleading the first respondent as second defendant and the second respondent as first defendant. On July 7, 1938, the claim to set aside the sale came before the High Court. The judge's note was as follows:—

"Claim to set aside a sale.

"No appearance by or for plaintiff.

"Second defendant in person—says he has briefed Wright.

"First defendant not served—no appearance.

"Letter from Alakija and Alakija asking for pleadings—presumably for plaintiff.

"Telegram from Vincent for plaintiff asking for pleadings and adjournment.

"Wright informs court that there has not yet been any sale.

"Second defendant bought subject to the approval of the Governor and that approval has not yet been given, so there has been no sale.

"Applies for case to be struck out. Order 18, rule 1.

"ORDER: The case is struck out with costs to second defendant assessed at five guineas.

"(Sgd.) DONALD KINGDON.
"Chief Judge."

On August 16, 1938, the Acting Resident, Warri Province, approved the first respondent as purchaser pursuant to section 11 of the Crown Lands Ordinance. On August 22, 1938, the assistant judge in the High Court of the Warri Judicial Division (Pearson A.J.) issued a certificate that the first respondent had been declared the purchaser of the right, title and interest of the appellant in the land.

No further proceedings were taken by the appellant until on September 15, 1947, the appellant moved the Supreme Court of Nigeria in the Warri Judicial Division at Warri to re-list the suit which had been struck out on July 7, 1938. The motion was supported by an affidavit dated July 19, 1947, which included the following paragraphs:—

"6. That late lawyer Alakija and Alakija and lawyer Olatunde Vincent whom I engaged for pleading and adjournment of the case. I come from Lagos in March, 1942, and I investigated from the records to know what happened before the case was struck out. I got the copies of the judgment of the case. . . .

"9. That my delay to bring up the case was due to all the documents about the case with lawyer Alakija. I got only few of the documents."

On the hearing of the motion both the appellant and the respondents appeared in person, and no note of any argument appeared to have been made. The judge of the Supreme Court (Rhodes J.) granted leave to re-list the suit.

At the hearing of the suit on December 18, 1947, the appellant deposed (inter alia) that there were only two publications made in the Nigeria Gazette and not three, and that he had had offers of £2,000 made to him for the purchase of the land but "they were waiting for the completion of the Gazette Notices."

J. C.
JOHN OJOBO AGBEYEGBE v. FESTUS MAKENE IKOMI.

He also stated that the respondent during his occupation had removed some of the buildings on the land and rebuilt others. Rhodes J., in giving judgment, did not comment on the nine years' delay which had elapsed between the sale and the application to have the case re-listed, or on the reasons given by the appellant to excuse the delay, but found that owing to the fact that only two notices of the sale had been given the sale was irregular and null, and he stated that he was satisfied from the evidence that the appellant had sustained substantial injury by reason of the irregularity.

On appeal by the respondent to the West African Court of Appeal, the appeal was allowed, the court (Sir John Verity C.J., Sir Henry Blackall P. and Lewey J.) being of opinion that in the exercise of his discretion the trial judge did not appear to have taken into consideration all the relevant circumstances, including such questions as to the extent of the delay in making the application to re-list the case, the reasons for the delay, the nature of the claim and the effect of granting leave on the rights of the respondent.

A number of authorities were cited in argument.

1953. January 12. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD OAKSEY, who stated the facts set out above and continued:—Their Lordships are in agreement with the West African Court of Appeal in thinking that the trial judge did not exercise his discretion judicially on these matters.

A number of technical points have been argued on both sides before their Lordships. It has been argued for the appellant that the respondent ought to have appealed against the order to re-list and that the laches was not taken as a formal point at the earliest possible moment. The parties, however, were not legally represented at the hearing to re-list, no note was taken of their arguments at that stage, the question of delay was put in the forefront of the cross-examination of the respondent at the hearing and counsel for the appellant before their Lordships recognized that the delay which had occurred was the real difficulty which he had to face.

In cases of laches the law was stated by Lord Blackburn in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Company[1]: "In Lindsay Petroleum Company v. Hurd[2] it is said: 'The doctrine of laches in courts of equity is not an arbitrary or a technical doctrine. Where it would be practically unjust to give a

But " ' in every case if an argument against relief, which otherwise " ' would be just, is founded upon mere delay, that delay of " ' course not amounting to a bar by any statute of limitations, " ' the validity of that defence must be tried upon principles " ' substantially equitable. Two circumstances always important " ' in such cases are the length of the delay and the nature of " ' the acts done during the interval, which might affect either " ' party and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking the " ' one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy.' I " have looked in vain for any authority which gives a more " distinct and definite rule than this; and I think, from the " nature of the inquiry, it must always be a question of more " or less, depending on the degree of diligence which might " reasonably be required, and the degree of change which has " occurred, whether the balance of justice or injustice is in " favour of granting the remedy or withholding it. The deter- " mination of such a question must largely depend on the turn " of mind of those who have to decide, and must therefore be " subject to uncertainty; but that, I think, is inherent in the " nature of the inquiry."

The length of the delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval in the present case, in their Lordships' opinion, cause a balance of justice in favour of the respondent, who had been in possession of the land for nine years at the time of the trial.

Reliance was placed on behalf of the appellant on Weld v. Petre [3] and Clifford v. Clifford,[4] but in their Lordships' view these cases are not in point in the present case. Weld v. Petre [3] was a case of a mortgage, and it was expressly stated by Russell J. that delay in exercising the rights of a mortgagee stood upon an entirely different footing from delays in cases such as the present, where the court is asked to re-open a matter which has been already decided. Clifford v. Clifford [4] was a case of nullity of marriage, and in such a case it is obvious that there may be circumstances which induce the delay which have no resemblance to the facts of the present case. In no other case to which their Lordships' attention has been drawn has there been anything like a delay of nine years, and having regard to the length of the delay, the inadequacy of the explanation of the delay and the consequences of setting aside the sale of land as against a bona fide purchaser for value who had been

A window-cleaner owned a motor-van which he used for carrying buckets, cloths and wash-leathers in connexion with his business. He was not in possession of a "C" licence in respect of the van.

Held, that buckets, cloths and wash-leathers were "goods" within section 36 (1) of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, and that therefore the van required a licence under section 1 (1) of the Act for their carriage.

CASE STATED.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Sleaford, an information was preferred by the appellant, Cecil Clarke, under section 1 of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, charging the respondent, Arthur Herbert Ernest Cherry, with having, on May 27, 1952, at Martin, Lincolnshire, unlawfully used a goods vehicle, namely, a Jowett motor-van, for the carriage of goods for or in connexion with his trade or business otherwise than under a licence granted under Part I of the Act.

The respondent, who was a window-cleaner, had adapted the motor-van to carry ladders, and also used it for carrying buckets, cloths and wash-leathers. The respondent was not in possession of a "C" licence in respect of the van.

The appellant contended that the van was a goods vehicle as defined by section 1 (2) of the Act, and that it was being used for or in connexion with a trade or business. The justices, being of opinion that the articles carried were solely and exclusively the tools of the respondent's trade and not goods carried for sale, held that the van was not being used for the carriage of goods and dismissed the information.

CLARKE v. CHERRY.

G. R. Swanwick, for the appellant, referred to no cases. The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

LORD GODDARD C.J. I am not surprised that the justices tried to find a way to avoid a conviction in a case of this sort, but they cannot do it by reading into the statute words which are not there. The Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, s. 1, does not say anything about the goods carried being goods for sale. On the other hand, section 36 (1) provides: "'Goods' includes goods "or burden of any description." They would, therefore, include buckets, cloths and wash-leathers. Section 1 provides: "(1) "Subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, no person "shall use a goods vehicle on a road for the carriage of goods— "(a) for hire or reward; or (b) for or in connexion with any trade "or business carried on by him, except under a licence. (2) In "this Part of this Act the expression 'goods vehicle' means a "motor vehicle constructed or adapted for use for the carriage "of goods . . ." Therefore, the respondent required a "C" licence which would entitle him to carry goods for or in connexion with his trade or business.

The case must go back to the justices with an intimation that an offence within section 1 (1) of the Act has been committed, but it is open to them to give a conditional discharge to the respondent if they think it right to do so.

after December 31, 1943, of a pre-occupational capital debt which "if due was not demanded by the creditor," such payment should be revalued in accordance with the scale set out in the schedule to the Ordinance.

The trial judge held that under section 4 (2) the onus was on the respondent, on a claim for revaluation by the appellant, to prove that before repayment of a pre-occupational capital debt paid by the respondent in occupation currency to the appellant after December 31, 1943, there had been a demand for payment by the appellant. The trial judge held that the respondent, who had called only one witness, had failed to prove that any demand had in fact been made. The appellant had called no evidence. On appeal by the respondent, the Court of Appeal held that the onus of proving no demand was on the appellant, and that in the circumstances the proper course was not to order a new trial, but to enter judgment for the respondent.

On appeal by the appellant it was contended that in view of the wrong direction on onus by the trial judge the appellant had at the trial probably, or possibly, refrained from calling a witness whom he might have called, and in that way had suffered injustice in consequence of the judge's wrong direction:—

Held, that the Court of Appeal were right in their view as to the onus; that an erroneous direction on onus was ground for granting a new trial if the error had led to substantial injustice, but that the appellant had failed to show with any probability that injustice or prejudice had resulted from the trial judge's erroneous ruling on onus.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal, Supreme Court of the Federation of Malaya, affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 45 of 1951) from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of the Federation of Malaya (May 29, 1951) reversing a judgment of Abbott J. sitting as judge of first instance in the High Court at Malacca (October 6, 1950).

The following introductory statement is taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee. The questions at issue were concerned with the application of certain provisions of the Debtor and Creditor (Occupation Period) Ordinance, No. 42 of 1948 of the Federation of Malaya, which came into effect on October 1, 1948, and was designed to regulate the relationship of debtor and creditor as regarded debts incurred before and during the enemy occupation of the territory of the Federation. The period of occupation as defined by the Ordinance was from February 15, 1942, to September 5, 1945 (section 2 (1)).

In that period the Japanese issued a new dollar currency, referred to in the Ordinance as "occupation currency," which circulated freely throughout the Federation side by side with the existing Malayan currency. Occupation currency was used to meet and discharge liabilities and debts, but in the latter part of the occupation period it depreciated severely in terms of Malayan dollars and finally became valueless. It was to remedy injustices suffered by creditors who were repaid in depreciated occupation currency that the Ordinance was made.

The relevant provisions of the Ordinance were:—"Section "4 (1) Subject to the provisions of subsection (2) of this section, "where any payment was made during the occupation period "in Malayan currency or occupation currency by a debtor or "by his agent . . . to a creditor, or to his agent . . . and such "payment was made in respect of a pre-occupation debt, such "payment shall be a valid discharge of such pre-occupation debt "to the extent of the face value of such payment.

"(2) In any case . . . (b) Where such payment was made "after December 31, 1943, in occupation currency in respect of "a pre-occupation capital debt, exceeding 250 dollars in amount, "which . . . (ii) if due, was not demanded by the creditor or "by his agent on his behalf and was not payable within the "occupation period under a time essence contract . . . such "payment shall be revalued in accordance with the scale set "out in the schedule to this Ordinance and shall be a valid "discharge of such debt only to the extent of such revaluation." "Pre-occupation capital debt" was defined as meaning any pre-occupation debt other than a sum accruing due after the commencement of the occupation period in respect of rent or interest (section 4 (3)), and "pre-occupation debt" was defined as a debt payable by virtue of an obligation incurred prior to the commencement of the occupation period and accruing due at any time (section 2 (1)). There was a provision by which, for the purposes of the Ordinance, any person who had authority to act as agent for another immediately prior to the commencement of the occupation period was deemed, subject to certain safeguards, to have been the agent of his former principal to the extent that he continued, during the occupation period and while his former principal was absent, to act on behalf of his former principal in any matter which would have been within the scope of his former authority (section 2 (2)). There were also provisions enabling the creditor whose debt had been secured by a charge over property to have the property charged with the revalued balance of the debt and interest (section 11).

The facts were simple. In October, 1941, the appellant advanced 26,000 dollars to the respondent, secured by a mortgage. The debt was a pre-occupation capital debt. On July 16, 1943, the respondent paid to the appellant the sum of 10,000 dollars, and on September 25, 1944, a further sum of 16,000 dollars together with all interest accrued due. Those payments were in occupation currency. The mortgaged land was accordingly released from the mortgage and reconveyed by the appellant to the respondent.

The appellant's contention was that the payment of 16,000 dollars made on September 25, 1944, being a payment in occupation currency made after December 31, 1943, had not been demanded, though it was due, by him or his agent on his behalf, and should therefore be revalued under section 4 (2). By the application of the schedule to the Ordinance the sum of 16,000 dollars would then fall to be revalued at 1,142.86 dollars, with the result that of the capital sum of 26,000 dollars only 11,142.86 dollars would have been repaid, leaving an unpaid balance of 14,857.14 dollars.

The appellant, after giving notice to the respondent to reinstate the mortgage under section 11 (3) of the Ordinance, and after the refusal of the respondent to comply, instituted proceedings pursuant to section 11 (5) of the Ordinance by an originating summons dated December 30, 1949, claiming a declaration that the lands originally mortgaged were charged with the capital sum of 14,857.14 dollars with interest. The summons was supported by an affidavit of December 30, 1949, by one Karuppiah, who affirmed: "1. I am the attorney of the ". . . plaintiff." In the second and third paragraphs of the affidavit the history of the transaction was narrated. In paragraph 4 it was said, "My principal the plaintiff nor any other "person on his behalf demand payment of the principal sum "due under the said mortgage." It would be observed that the affidavit did not state that Karuppiah was the appellant's attorney when or before the repayments were made. An affidavit in answer was made on August 7, 1950, by Ramalingam Pillay, who deposed that he had been the respondent's attorney during the occupation period and that demands for repayment of the debt had been made verbally by the appellant's then attorney down to September, 1944. The implication was that Karuppiah had not been the appellant's attorney in the period down to September, 1944. No application was made to the court in order that either Karuppiah's or Ramalingam Pillay's evidence should be tested by cross-examination.

The case came before Abbott J. on October 6, 1950. It appeared from the formal order made by the court that the affidavit of Karuppiah was read in court but that the affidavit of Ramalingam Pillay was not read, and there was nothing in the record to show that Abbott J. regarded either affidavit as of any importance. At the outset of the hearing the appellant's advocate submitted that the issue was one of "demand" (that was, whether repayment had been demanded by the appellant before it was made) and that it was for the respondent to prove it. The respondent's advocate agreed, and the court accepted the view that the onus was on the respondent to show that a demand had been made. The respondent then adduced a witness named Murugappan. He deposed that he was the respondent's attorney and that he knew the appellant's attorney, who was then in court. He said that in the occupation period he was in Malacca, but that Ramalingam was then the respondent's attorney. He also said that the appellant's attorney was not then Karuppiah. As to the demand for repayment, he said that in the occupation period Ramalingam and he lived in the same house and shared a room, and that the appellant's attorney came several times to their house and demanded payment in his hearing. He was cross-examined to credibility, and in answer to one question he said that all the other people who were present when the demands were made were now in India. The appellant's advocate at the end of Murugappan's evidence said that he would call no evidence.

The judgment of Abbott J. was very brief. He said, "The "evidence called upon the part of the defendant has failed to "satisfy me that any demand was in fact made. There must, "therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff with costs."

The respondent appealed, and in the Court of Appeal the judgment was given by Foster-Sutton C.J., with whom Taylor and Wilson JJ. concurred. The question mainly argued was that of onus and the learned Chief Justice held that the onus of proving no demand rested on the appellant, and in the result it was held that the proper course was not to grant a new trial, but to enter judgment for the respondent.

The appellant appealed.

1953. January 12. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord NORMAND, who stated the facts set out above and continued: Their Lordships have not the smallest doubt that the opinion of the Court of Appeal on the question of onus is the correct view, for it was the appellant who relied on the terms of the Ordinance and it was therefore for him to bring himself within them. The judgment of the Chief Justice on this point is not now seriously challenged. It is not necessary to say more on this aspect of the case, but it does appear from the judgment that in at least one case decided by the Court of Appeal after the date of the judgment of Abbott J. in this case, the same question had arisen, and it is not unlikely that, as the appellant's counsel suggested, the practice in the courts of first instance had been proceeding on an erroneous view on the question of onus.

The Chief Justice then dealt with an argument that Karuppiah's affidavit was inadmissible under Order 36, r. 3, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, Straits Settlements, because it contained statements which the deponent was not able by his own knowledge to prove. On this the Chief Justice held that since the affidavit had not been objected to at the trial the complaint came too late; but he held that the affidavit had little evidentiary value in discharging the onus of proof. Their Lordships find it unnecessary to consider this matter further, for it was not argued to their Lordships that if the onus was on the appellant it had been discharged, or that the Court of Appeal should have given judgment for the appellant.

The true issue in the appeal is the last point dealt with by the Chief Justice, whether in the circumstances a new trial should be ordered. He held that the proper course was not to order a new trial but to enter judgment for the respondent. The reason given by him is that the appellant knew what the issue was from the affidavit of Karuppiah, and that there was no suggestion that he had been surprised. He cited a well-known passage from the speech of Lord Chelmsford in Shedden v. Patrick and Attorney-General[1]: "It is an invariable rule in all the courts, "and one founded upon the clearest principles of reason and "justice, that if evidence which either was in the possession of "parties at the time of a trial, or by proper diligence might have "been obtained, is either not produced, or has not been procured, "and the case is decided adversely to the side to which the "evidence was available, no opportunity for producing that "evidence ought to be given by the granting a new trial."

In the argument which the appellant's counsel addressed to their Lordships there was no challenge of the principle enunciated by Lord Chelmsford, and no contention that the appellant had been surprised. What was said was that the trial judge had decided the case on an erroneous view of the onus which had been accepted by him before any oral evidence was led, and that in consequence of the wrong direction upon onus the appellant had at the trial probably, or possibly, refrained from calling a witness whom he might have called, and that in this way the appellant had suffered injustice in consequence of the judge's wrong direction.

An erroneous direction on onus is ground for granting a new trial if the error has led to substantial injustice. That is the result of two decisions in the middle of last century cited by the appellant's counsel (Doe d. Bather v. Brayne,[2] Brandford v. Freeman[3]), in which the effect of an erroneous ruling as to the right to begin was the point under consideration. The rule established by these and other cases is repeated in Ord. 39, r. 6, of the Rules of the Supreme Court in England. There was some doubt whether it formed part of the law of Malaya. Their Lordships were not referred to any Malayan Ordinance or order or printed rule excluding it, and they will assume in favour of the appellant that it prevails in the courts of Malaya (Ordinance No. 43 of 1948, section 36 (2)). But it is necessary that the appellant should show that the condition on which the right to a new trial depends has been fulfilled. That condition is clearly stated by Pollock C.B. and by Parke B. in Brandford v. Freeman.[3] Pollock C.B. in that case cited from his own judgment in Edwards v. Matthews,[4] a passage in which he said[5] "that the "plaintiff or defendant having been called on to begin, when "proof of the issue lay on his adversary, is not a sufficient ground "for a new trial, unless it is manifest that the course of justice "has been thereby interfered with, and some substantial injury "effected." Parke B. said,[6] "This court has settled, that when "there has been a mere error with respect to the order of "beginning, as deduced from the pleadings, no new trial ought "to be granted; but that it is otherwise if the error has led to "substantial injustice." In Sanders v. Sanders,[7] Jessel M.R., dealing with an application to bring forward fresh evidence before the Court of Appeal, said[8]: "The application is for an indulgence. "He might have adduced the evidence in the court below. That "he might have shaped his case better in the court below is no "ground for leave to adduce fresh evidence before the Court "of Appeal. As it has often been said, nothing is more dangerous "than to allow fresh oral evidence to be introduced after a case "has been discussed in court. The exact point on which evidence "is wanted having thus been discovered, to allow fresh evidence "to be introduced at that stage would offer a strong temptation "to perjury." These considerations apply with at least equal force when the application is for a new trial.

Their Lordships must therefore consider whether the appellant has succeeded in making out a case of manifest injustice. He can do this by satisfying the Board that there is a strong probability that he has been prejudiced by the error of the trial judge in throwing the onus on his opponent. In considering this question their Lordships are not disposed to attach importance to the fact that at the trial the appellant's advocate himself appears to have taken the initiative in inducing the error, or to the fact that the respondent's advocate agreed that the onus lay on him and then changed his attitude in the Court of Appeal. The question where the onus lies is a question of law, and an admission of law may be subsequently withdrawn. There is also some reason for thinking that the two advocates were only stating to the trial judge what at the time was held by the courts of first instance to be the correct rule.

What is said is that at the moment when the respondent's only witness left the witness box, the appellant's counsel had to make up his mind whether he would adduce any evidence either to establish his own case or to rebut the respondent's case. He had in the appellant's attorney Karuppiah a witness present and available whom he might have called and who might have said that he was attorney for the appellant in the occupation period. Such evidence, if believed, would have given value to his own affidavit and would also have discredited the evidence for the respondent. It must, it was urged, be assumed that Karrupiah could have given this evidence, for to suppose otherwise would be to assume that his affidavit was put forward dishonestly and for the purpose of deceiving the court, and that was not a permissible assumption.

Ingenious as the argument is, their Lordships are unable to give their assent to it. It is all speculation and, if there were substance in it, it ought to have been developed in the Court of Appeal. It is going too far when it is said that an advocate did not adduce evidence which would have been so important to his case merely because he had in his favour a ruling on onus and because he had formed a low opinion of his adversary's evidence and believed that the judge would reject it. It is at least as probable that the appellant's advocate did not call Karuppiah because he feared that his evidence would not help or might even harm his case. But this is also a speculation. Their Lordships do not choose between the various possible explanations of the course taken by the advocate, and they certainly make no reflection whatever on his conduct of the case. Their opinion is that the appellant has failed to show with any probability that injustice or prejudice resulted from the ruling on onus.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

The plaintiff, whose husband made no provision for her in his will, applied to the court under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, for an order for her maintenance out of the testator's net estate. She had left the testator because of his cruelty.

The estate was under £2,000 in value, and the court was asked to order a capital payment of one-half of the capital under section 1 (4), or, alternatively, to order the maximum amount allowed by the Act under subsection (3) of section 1 plus supplementary payments of capital under subsection (4):—

Held, (1) that, even if the court had jurisdiction, it would not in the exercise of its discretion order payment of one-half of the capital in the present case, but that the plaintiff was entitled to one-half of the income under subsection (3).

(2) The court had no jurisdiction to order further payments out of capital under subsection (4).

Semble, that where a capital payment was made under that subsection, the amount of capital which could be awarded was, as laid down in In re Catmull [1943] Ch. 262; 59 T.L.R. 319; [1943] 2 All E.R. 115, no more than the capitalized value of the maximum amount of income which could be awarded under subsection (3), and not, as suggested in In re Vrint [1940] Ch. 920; 56 T.L.R. 953; [1940] 3 All E.R. 470, half of the capital.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Thomas Bates was married to the plaintiff on April 2, 1938. He made his will on July 27, 1951. He appointed the first defendant as his sole executor, and after making certain specific bequests he gave his residuary estate equally between two named charities.

In clause 5 of his will, the testator stated: "I desire to state "that the reason I have given my wife no benefit under this my "will is that she deserted me over six years ago and I have not "seen her since and the reason I have given my sons no bene-"fit . . . (other than as contained in clause 2 hereof) is that they "have had no communication with me for several years." The sons referred to were sons by a former marriage, and not by the testator's marriage with the plaintiff.

The evidence of the plaintiff was that she left the testator because he treated her with great cruelty. Her evidence was corroborated by her stepson, and was not contradicted.

The plaintiff applied to the court under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, for an order for her maintenance out of the testator's net estate. It was contended on her behalf that this case was one in which the maximum amount allowed under the Act should be ordered; and further that the estate being under £2,000, she should receive a capital payment under subsection (4) of section 1 of the Act.†

BATES, DECD., In re. BATES v. RODWAY.

The cases referred to in argument are referred to in the judgment.

ROXBURGH J. having stated the facts continued:—It is plain that the testator so treated his wife that she had very good reason for leaving the matrimonial home.

The residuary legatees, who are charities, have very properly left the matter to me, not wishing to submit arguments against provision being made for her. As it has been left to me in that way, I need not give reasons for my conclusion that, in the circumstances of this case, I ought (subject to something which I shall say later) to award her the maximum permissible amount of one-half of the annual income of the net estate, which may be treated as £28 per annum, during her widowhood.

Matters of general interest now arise. Mr. Bagnall for the plaintiff is not content with that amount. The estate is under £2,000, and subsection (4) of section 1 of the Act is, therefore, brought into operation.

[His Lordship read the subsection.]

This difficult subsection has been twice considered in these courts. The first occasion was in In re Vrint,[1] in which Bennett J. said[2]: "The amount available in the circumstances of such a "case as this, where a testator leaves a wife and no other depen- "dant, is either one-half of the income or where, as in this case, "the testator's net estate does not exceed £2,000, one-half of "the capital."

That was a passing observation by Bennett J. It was not of any particular moment in the view which he took of the case before him. The point was not argued, and I can hardly think that he was consciously construing this difficult subsection by those random words, "one-half of the capital."

It may be, however, that I should have felt that I ought to give more weight to them than I do, if the matter had not been the subject-matter of a contrary decision of Uthwatt J. in In re Catmull.[3] There the point which arises under subsection (4), namely, whether the court can give one-half of the capital or whether it is limited to the capitalized value of the amount which could otherwise be given under subsection (3), was argued by counsel on both sides and decided by the judge. Mr. Myles, in his submission, said[4]: "The court has a discretion under sub- "section (4) to make a larger provision than it could under "subsection (3)." Mr. Astell Burt submitted[4]: "In making "an order for a capital payment, under section 1 (4), the "court cannot award more than the capitalized value of the "maximum amount of income which it would order under sub- "section (3)." The issue being thus joined, Uthwatt J. dealt at considerable length with the question. I shall not read the whole passage, which is a long one,[5] but he came to the conclusion that the subsection was limited to the capitalized value of the provision which would otherwise be made under subsection (3).

Mr. Bagnall has submitted that that decision was obiter, and that I need not and ought not to follow it. I do not think that it was obiter, though I have not (for reasons which will appear in a moment) troubled counsel to look into the authorities on what is and what is not obiter, and therefore what I am saying may perhaps prove not to be right; I should myself, however, have hardly thought that it was obiter. Uthwatt J., having to exercise a discretion or not, first discussed and decided the area within which his discretion was to operate; and then, as a matter of discretion, he decided not to exercise it. It is because he did not exercise it that Mr. Bagnall says that his decision on the point is obiter, but I doubt that. The first thing that he had to do, in order to be in a proper position either to exercise or not to exercise his discretion, was to find out the area within which his discretion operated; and therefore (though I have not gone far into that question) I do not feel at all inclined to the view that it was obiter.

If I were driven to make up my mind on this point, I should decide that I was bound to follow In re Catmull.[6] I think that the point is difficult; but, in the view that I take of the circumstances of the present case, I need not pursue this question any further. Mr. Bagnall has asked me, first of all, to order an immediate lump sum payment to his client of one-half of the capital, without conditions. That I should not do in the exercise of my discretion, if I had jurisdiction to do it.

The next thing which he asked me to do was to order that she should receive one-half of the net income plus supplementary payments out of capital. That I plainly have no jurisdiction to do as that would certainly be violating the principle of subsection (3) of section 1, because it would in principle be giving her more than half the annual income.

Lastly, he asked me to give her the capitalized value of her widowhood interest. That I have jurisdiction to do—it is in accordance with the decision of Uthwatt J. in In re Catmull [6]—but I do not think that in this case it is expedient to do so.

It is for those reasons that I do not need finally to decide whether I am bound by In re Catmull,[6] though it appears to me that I am. The plaintiff will accordingly have £28 per annum, that is, half the net income during widowhood; it will be payable quarterly and run from the death of the testator.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs, the British Electrical and Associated Industries (Cardiff) Ld., claimed damages from the defendants, Patley Pressings Ld., for repudiation of an agreement to sell to them some 200 tons of mild steel angles. They also claimed a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified by the defendants, whom they alleged entered into the agreement of sale with knowledge that the plaintiffs intended to re-sell at a profit to an American firm, against any claim which might be made against them by their sub-buyers by reason of their inability to deliver under a similar agreement to sell through the defendants defaulting in their agreement.

The defendants, in turn, brought in as third parties Reid Brothers (Glasgow) Ld., from whom they had purchased on similar terms, claiming against them a declaration of indemnity in respect of damages which they might be held liable to pay to the plaintiffs, and also damages in their own right. The third parties brought in as fourth parties, Douglas Scott & Sons Ld., from whom they had purchased, again on similar terms, claiming against them an indemnity in respect of any damages which they might be held liable to pay, and also damages.

By paragraph 1 of their statement of claim against the defendants the plaintiffs alleged: "By an agreement made orally "between the plaintiffs and the defendants on or about December "11, 1950, or alternatively by a contract in writing signed on "behalf of the defendants dated December 11, 1950, and a letter "from the plaintiffs to the defendants dated December 12, 1950, "the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 200 tons of mild "steel angles at the price of £32 15s. per ton F.O.B. London/ "Liverpool and to deliver the same in mid-March, 1951."

The two documents relied upon by the plaintiffs as constituting the agreement in writing were, first, a contract note dated December 11, 1950, signed by the director of the defendants, which was in the following terms:

"We confirm having sold you the following material:

"Description, mild steel angles." [The specification was then set out];

"Quantity, 200 tons; price, £32 15s. per ton, F.O.B. London/ "Liverpool; delivery, in mid-March;

"Terms, nett cash against wharfingers' receipt and weigh- "bridge ticket;

The second document was a letter dated December 12 from the plaintiffs to the defendants accepting the offer made in the following terms: "We received your contract No. 1634A dated "December 11, according to which we have bought from you the "following materials." The terms as set out by the plaintiffs were substantially the same as those set out in the contract note.

In answer to the plaintiffs' claim the defendants alleged that the clause, "subject to force majeure conditions that the govern- "ment restricts the export of material at the time of delivery," were so uncertain as to render the contract unenforceable, since there was, in connexion with the trade, a variety of force majeure conditions and no agreement had been reached between the parties as to which of such conditions should apply.

BRITISH ELECTRICAL AND ASSOCIATED INDUSTRIES (CARDIFF) LD. v. PATLEY PRESSINGS LD.

In the correspondence between the third parties and the defendants, and the fourth parties and the third parties, the suppliers stated in each case that they confirmed the orders given "subject to the appropriate Ministry of Supply orders . . . and "the materials will be charged at the prices ruling under such "orders at the date of dispatch." The fourth parties, and in turn the third parties, refused to deliver the goods ordered except at a price above the contract price. That refusal was accepted by the defendants in a letter of March 9, 1951, as a repudiation by the third parties. As between the third and fourth parties the refusal by the fourth parties to deliver was not accepted by the third parties as a repudiation by the fourth parties until July 5, 1951. It was accordingly contended by the fourth parties that, in those circumstances, they could not be liable for the third parties' breach of their contractual obligations to the defendants, since the final breach between the third parties and the defendants occurred on March 9, 1951, and could not, therefore, have been caused by the fourth parties' breach on July 5.

December 12, 1952. MCNAIR J., after stating the facts, said that, in his opinion, the contract note of December 11, 1950, and the plaintiffs' letter of acceptance of the following day did not purport to be an offer and acceptance constituting a written contract, but merely purported to confirm an oral contract which had been already made between the plaintiffs and the defendants. [His lordship continued:] Accepting for a moment that the contract note constitutes an admission by the defendants of the terms of the oral agreement, the first question which I have to determine is whether or not the words "subject to force majeure "conditions, that the government restricts the export of material "at the time of delivery," are words which prevent the court from holding that any enforceable contract was made. In my judgment, they are.

In the first place, I consider that, whether the word "condi- "tions" means "stipulations" or "clauses" on the one hand, or "contingencies" or "circumstances" on the other hand, the whole sentence is so vague and uncertain as to be incapable of any precise meaning and so brings the case within the principles stated in the House of Lords in G. Scammell & Nephew Ld. v. Ouston.[1] The passages which, in my judgment, are particularly relevant on this matter occur in the speech of Lord Maugham, where he said[2]: "In order to constitute a valid contract the "parties must so express themselves that their meaning can be "determined with a reasonable degree of certainty," and in the speech of Lord Wright,[3] where he said that the first ground on which the court ought to hold on the facts of that case that there was no contract was "that the language used was so "obscure and so incapable of any definite or precise meaning that "the court is unable to attribute to the parties any particular "contractual intention."

In the second place, however, I consider that the word "conditions" in this context, as a matter of construction, quite clearly means "clauses" or "stipulations" and not "contingencies" or "circumstances." If "conditions" means "contingencies" or "circumstances" the word adds nothing to the phrase "force majeure." Furthermore, such a construction would involve giving a different meaning to the word "conditions" where it appears in the phrase under construction from that which it bears in the sidenote to that particular paragraph. If, accordingly, as I hold, the word "conditions" means "clauses" or "stipulations," then, there being evidence given in the action before me that there was in the trade a variety of force majeure conditions, this case falls quite plainly within the line of authority of such cases as Love & Stewart Ld. v. S. Instone & Co. Ld.,[4] in which the House of Lords had to consider the effect of a contract containing the words "subject to strike and lock-out clauses," and within the principle stated in G. Scammell & Nephew Ld. v. Ouston,[5] to which I have already referred (where the phrase was "on "hire-purchase terms"), and Bishop & Baxter Ld. v. Anglo-Eastern Trading and Industrial Co. Ld.,[6] where the Court of Appeal, in considering a purported agreement (which contained the phrase "subject to war clause") held that, as the war clause took many forms, and as there was no evidence that the parties had any particular form of clause in mind, there was no consensus ad idem and, therefore, no completed contract.

Those cases seem to me to establish that, notwithstanding that the parties may have thought and acted on the basis that a contract existed between them, no consensus ad idem will be held to exist where there still remains to be negotiated and agreed the exact form of the clauses or conditions referred to by the parties. So far, I have considered the matter solely on the basis of this contract note; but the matter was made even clearer by the evidence given on behalf of the defendants by their director, which established to my satisfaction that in the negotiations the parties must be taken to have used the term "conditions" in the sense which I have indicated.

Accordingly, the plaintiffs' claim against the defendants breaks down in limine on account of their failure to prove any concluded contract. If I had been satisfied that the parties had reached contractual certainty in the terms pleaded and, furthermore, that there was a sufficient note or memorandum of their agreement to satisfy section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, I should have had no hesitation at all in holding (1) that the defendants knew that the plaintiffs required the goods and entered into the agreement for the purpose of re-selling at a profit, and (2) that the defendants, by refusing to deliver the goods of the description called for by the contract, except against payment of an increased price, repudiated their contractual obligations, which repudiation the plaintiffs, by the issue of the writ herein on April 5, 1951, treated as a final breach entitling them to damages. I would have assessed those damages at the sum of £250, being the difference between the contract price of £32 15s. per ton and the market price of £34 per ton (for which the plaintiffs contended, and which was agreed between these parties for this purpose).

On the other hand, I should not, as at present advised, have allowed the plaintiffs' claim for a declaration of indemnity as prayed for, and this for two reasons: first, because I am not satisfied that the plaintiffs' liability, if any, under their sub-sale to their American buyers arose from the defendants' default and, secondly, because I think that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Trans Trust S.P.R.L. v. Danubian Trading Co., Ld.[7] would have precluded me from making the declaration in the form asked for. I confess humbly, with respect, to some difficulty in understanding fully the limitations imposed by that judgment upon a judge of first instance in making declarations of this nature which, so far as my experience goes, have been granted more or less as a matter of form in the case of this sort of contract; but the Court of Appeal have taken the view that, at any rate on the facts of the Trans Trust case,[7] which, on this point, seem to me to be indistinguishable from the facts of this case, it is undesirable that a declaration for an indemnity should be granted. I would accordingly have followed that decision had it become necessary.

I next turn to the claim as between the defendants and the third parties. The conclusion which I have reached in the proceedings between the plaintiffs and the defendants disposes of the claim for an indemnity in the third party action; but there remains to be considered the claim for damages. For the reasons which I stated earlier, I am of opinion that the words " subject to force majeure conditions " (which appear in a context similar to that already considered in the documents alleged to constitute a contract between these parties) preclude me from holding that any completed consensus ad idem was reached, on the ground that, in this phrase, " conditions " means " clauses " or " stipulations " and not " contingencies " or " circumstances." Had I been of the opinion that the words had either of the latter meanings (i.e., meant either " contingencies " or " cir- " cumstances ") I should not have acceded to Lord Hailsham's submission that, on that hypothesis, the phrase was too vague to have contractual effect. Though many cases have been cited to me in which obvious difficulty has been experienced in construing the phrase " force majeure " (see in particular Lebeaupin v. Richard Crispin and Co.[8]) in none of those cases was it considered that the phrase was too vague for construction. Nor would I have accepted the further submission that the phrase was too vague in the sense that it did not state the legal consequences which would follow on proof of force majeure, i.e., whether there should be cancellation or dissolution. I am quite satisfied that an agreement for sale which was otherwise precise and contained the phrase " subject to force majeure " would be a valid and enforceable contract.

[His lordship then referred to the relevant correspondence and said that had it not been for the decision at which he had arrived as to the meaning of force majeure conditions in the contracts he should have held that there was a firm contract between the defendants and the third parties, which had been repudiated by the third parties on March 9, and he should have assessed the damages accordingly at the sum of £400 in the case of the defendants and the third parties. Continuing, his lordship said:] Now, as between the third parties and fourth parties, the contractual documents which are material are, so far as is material, identical with those passing between the defendants and the third parties. For the reasons indicated above, I hold that no contract was established between these parties by reason of the use of the phrase " subject to force " majeure conditions "; but if I be wrong on this I should have held that there was a firm contract at £31 5s. per ton (subject to variation by the Ministry of Supply or by reason of Ministry of Supply orders, which in fact were non-existent) and that no fixed delivery date was agreed on.

On the above hypothesis, the question whether there was default by the sellers and the question of damages payable by the fourth parties do not fall to be determined on precisely the same lines as in the previous instance, since it is quite clear that, though the third parties in my view wrongfully insisted on an unauthorized price increase as early as February 23, and thereafter attempted to pass on successive increases of price and never departed from that attitude, the third parties, who were taking rather the same view as the fourth parties of this matter, never in fact accepted that conduct by the fourth parties as a repudiation of their contract until July 5, 1951, when the fourth party notice in these proceedings was issued. In the first place, it appears that at that date there was a final contractual default by the fourth parties which would have entitled the third parties to a claim for damages, but it was argued by Mr. Donaldson on behalf of the fourth parties that in any event the fourth parties could not be held liable for the third parties' breach of their contractual obligations towards the defendants since, as between these parties, the final breach occurred on March 9, and, so it was argued, could not have been caused by the fourth parties' breach on July 5.

Now, this argument, though ingenious and at first sight attractive, is, in my judgment, wholly fallacious and is based on a misreading of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Howard v. Pickford Tool Co.[9] Particular reliance was placed on the language of Asquith L.J., who said, "An unaccepted repudiation is a thing writ in water and of no value to anybody: it confers no legal rights of any sort or kind," and that observation no doubt was perfectly accurate in relation to the subject-matter which the Court of Appeal was then considering; but here it seems to me that it would be wholly artificial and entirely wrong to say that the breach by the third parties in failing to make delivery, which was accepted as a final breach on March 9, was not caused by the wrongful act of the fourth parties, then still subsisting and never withdrawn, in refusing to make delivery except at the increased price. But looking at it from the point of view of common sense, and, I believe, also from the point of view of sound law, the third parties' breach would, on the hypothesis stated, have been quite clearly proved to have been caused by the wrongful act of the fourth parties. However, that matter does not arise necessarily for my decision.

As regards damages, had it been necessary for me to make any assessment as between the third parties and fourth parties, I should have held that the market price at the date of the accepted breach, namely, July 5, 1951, was not less than £39 5s. 0d. per ton.

The result of that is that each of the proceedings along the line fails.

Shipping—Dock—Gangway leading from ship to wharf—Duty to provide "safe means of access"—Whether heads of gangway must be safe—Meaning—Docks Regulations, 1934 (S.R. & O. 1934, No. 279), reg. 9.

Regulation 9 of the Docks Regulations, 1934, provides: "If a "ship is lying at a wharf . . . for the purpose of loading . . . "there shall be safe means of access for the use of persons employed "at such times as they have to pass from the ship to the shore or "from the shore to the ship as follows:—(a) Where reasonably "practicable the ship's accommodation ladder or a gangway or a "similar construction not less than twenty-two inches wide, "properly secured, and fenced throughout on each side to a clear "height of two feet nine inches by means of upper and lower rails, "taut ropes or chains or by other equally safe means, . . . (b) In "other cases a ladder of sound material and adequate length which "shall be properly secured to prevent slipping. . . ."

Regulation 9 imposes an obligation on shipowners to provide a "safe means of access" and paragraphs (a) and (b) after the words "as follows" are not words of limitation, but words which prescribe what has to be done in addition to providing a safe means of access. A shipowner would not, therefore, escape a charge of breach of statutory duty merely by showing that he had provided a gangway which satisfied paragraph (a) of the regulation, but where the plaintiff, who was injured by falling on a gangway, had not established, as he had contended, that the treads on the gangway,—which otherwise satisfied paragraph (a)—were in an unsafe condition, the gangway did provide a safe means of access within the meaning of the regulation.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Francis Dawson, who was a licensed lighterman in the Port of London and a freeman of the river, employed by Silvertown Services Ltd., was on February 22, 1951, proceeding down the gangway of the s.s. Henzee, then loading at Symonds Wharf, having marshalled barges bringing up cargo. The gangway ran from the deck of Symonds Wharf to the ship's rail at an angle of 45 degrees. The plaintiff slipped at the top of the gangway, suffering injuries. He tore the supraspinatus tendon of his right shoulder, and was unable to do any work at all from February 23 until October 1, 1951, and was rendered incapable ever thereafter of performing his work as a lighterman.

The plaintiff brought this action against the Euxine Shipping Co. Ld., as owners of the s.s. Henzee, claiming damages in respect of those injuries (1) on the ground that the defendants were in breach of regulation 9 of the Docks Regulations, 1934; and (2) alleging breach of the common law duty owed by the defendants, as occupiers of the s.s. Henzee, to him as invitee. The plaintiff contended that the treads of the gangway were in an unsafe condition.

The defendants denied liability and pleaded that there had been no breach by them of either their statutory or common law duty to the plaintiff.

W. G. Wingate for the plaintiff.

Montague Berryman Q.C. and Peter Dow for the defendants.

The following cases were cited in argument: Kininmonth v. William France, Fenwick & Co. Ld.[1]; Harvey v. Royal Mail Lines Ld.[2]; London Graving Dock Co. Ld. v. Horton.[3]

It was conceded that the plaintiff was a " person employed " within the meaning of the regulations.

MCNAIR J. said, in the course of his judgment:—The first question is whether there has been a breach of regulation 9 of the Docks Regulations. [His Lordship read the regulation and continued:] The gangway in question was one which, by reason of its dimensions, satisfied paragraph (a). The gangway was 24 feet long; it was two feet six inches wide, and there were across the floor of the gangway cross-treads 12 inches apart and composed of battens which were said to be of hardwood one and a quarter inches square. Along either side of this gangway there were iron stanchions some three feet apart, and through a ring at the top of those iron stanchions there ran a rope, and through rings half way down there ran a second rope. That gangway, by reason of those dimensions, as I have said, satisfied paragraph (a) of regulation 9.

The first submission for the defendants was that by satisfying paragraph (a) they had wholly satisfied the obligation imposed on them by regulation 9. It seems to me that that submission is not well founded. The obligation imposed by paragraph 9 is that "there shall be safe means of access." True that is followed by the words "as follows," and then there are set out paragraphs (a) and (b); but I think, applying a reasonable construction to it, that those words are not words of limitation, but are words which prescribe what has to be done in addition to the provision of a safe means of access. In other words, where reasonably practicable, a ship's accommodation ladder or a gangway of the dimensions set out must be provided, and, where that is not reasonably practicable, that is, "in other cases," a ladder of sound material and adequate length must be provided. But, whichever of those paragraphs is applicable, the means of access must, to satisfy the regulation, be safe within the meaning of the regulation.

I think that that construction follows from the ordinary reading of the words, and it conforms with the whole scheme of these regulations and similar regulations made under the Act. Of course, when considering whether a means of access is safe, one has to have regard to the persons for whose protection the provision is made.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the defendants do not escape the charge of breach of statutory duty merely by proof that they had provided a gangway which satisfied paragraph (a) of regulation 9.

The main issue in the case, however, is whether or not the treads of that gangway were at the material time in a safe condition. [His Lordship considered the evidence on that matter and continued:] In the result I have come to a clear conclusion that this gangway did provide a safe means of access within the meaning of paragraph 9 of the Docks Regulations. I am not saying that the treads were as new, but the gangway with the treads in the condition in which they were was a safe means of access for the persons for whom the regulations are made, namely, for persons who are employed in the processes of loading and unloading.

That conclusion also disposes of the claim based on common law, because the obligation under the Factories Acts, as I see it, is a higher obligation than that imposed at common law, on the construction which I have placed upon the regulation.

[His Lordship then considered the question of damages, and said that had he found in the plaintiff's favour he would have assessed them at £3,000.]

Vagrancy—Common prostitute—Indecent act in parked motor car—Whether an offence—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 3.

A prostitute who behaves in an indecent manner in a motor car parked in a public highway is not "wandering in the public streets "or public highways," and accordingly does not commit an offence under section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

Semble, if a passer-by can see her so behave, she commits a common law misdemeanour.

CASE STATED by Sheffield justices.

The appellant prosecutor, a superintendent of police, preferred four informations against two women and a man. Each woman was charged for that she "being a common prostitute, wandering "in the public highway did behave in an indecent manner in a "public highway called Claywheels Lane, there situate; con-"trary to section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824."[1] The man was charged in connexion with each woman that he "unlawfully did "aid, abet, counsel or procure . . . a common prostitute in the "commission of an act of indecency in Claywheels Lane, a public "highway; contrary to section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction "Act, 1848."[2]

At the hearing of the informations the following facts were proved or admitted:—The women were common prostitutes. On the evening of April 23, 1952, the two women got into the man's motor car in a street in the centre of Sheffield and were driven by him to Claywheels Lane, in the suburbs. The man parked the car on waste land about six yards from the lane. Acts of indecency took place in the car, but were not observable except by a person who shone a torch on to the car, as did the police officer.

The justices were of the opinion that under the circumstances of the case the prostitutes could not be held to be wandering in a specific street within the meaning of section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and they dismissed the informations.

CARNILL v. EDWARDS.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the city of Sheffield, before whom three people, two prostitutes and a man, were charged under the Vagrancy Act. The two women were charged that each "being a common prostitute, wandering "in the public highway did behave in an indecent manner in a "public highway called Claywheels Lane, there situate." They were charged with wandering in Claywheels Lane and committing an indecent act, and the man was charged with aiding and abetting.

The facts stated show that this man was driving in a motor car and that he picked up these two prostitutes. He drove them out to Claywheels Lane, on the outskirts of Sheffield, and some actual acts of indecency took place in the motor car. It might be a very good thing, perhaps, as one knows that in these days, certainly in Hyde Park, women get into motor cars and commit acts of indecency, if that itself was made an offence. It could be made an offence for a prostitute to accept the invitation of a man to get into a motor car and, in the case of a man, to invite her. It could also be made an offence to commit indecent acts in a motor car even though the woman were not a common prostitute. Of course, if an indecent act is committed in a car standing on the highway in such a way that it can be seen by a passer-by, that is probably a common law misdemeanour, but we are not concerned with that; and we must not strain the law merely because these two women are common prostitutes or because there is a very laudable desire, no doubt, to clean up the city of Sheffield.

I think that the justices came to a proper decision. I cannot see how it can be said that, if a woman accepts an invitation and gets into a motor car, when they get to their destination the woman can be said to be wandering in the street. She is not wandering in the street; she is sitting in the motor car. The justices seem to have dismissed this case properly, but I am not sure that I follow their grounds. Their finding was: "We "being of opinion that under the circumstances of the case "the prostitutes could not be held to be wandering in a specific "street within the meaning of section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, "1824, dismissed the said informations." If they had said: "We "were of opinion that the prostitutes could not be said to be "wandering in Claywheels Lane," I quite agree, because they were not; they were sitting in a motor car in Claywheels Lane. My only doubt is whether the justices thought that a woman must wander in a specific street, but I do not think that they did, because the section talks about a common prostitute "wandering "in the public streets or highways," but it does not matter whether she wanders up and down one street or more than one. What I think the justices meant to find, and what commends itself to the court, is that in the case of the specific street mentioned in the informations, they were not wandering at all.

For these reasons we think that the justices came to a correct determination in point of law and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Damages—Personal injuries—Loss of arm—Loss of amenities of life not measurable in money—Impossibility of standardizing damages—Guidance from awards in previous cases.

The plaintiff, while working in a coal mine, sustained severe injuries and the loss of an arm through the defendant employers' breach of statutory duty. The defendants awarded him a permanent pension, and provided him with alternative employment, with the result that his actual loss of earnings was relatively small. The trial judge, who, on the plaintiff's claim for damages, expressed the opinion that the loss of amenities of life resulting from the injuries could not really be compensated by money, assessed damages at £10,000. On appeal by the defendants against the amount of damages:—

Held, reducing the damages awarded to £7,000, that in assessing damages for personal injuries in cases where the loss of amenities of life is such that money cannot be any true compensation, although the courts cannot apply any uniform standard, they will have regard to and be guided by the general principles which have been applied in decisions in comparable cases.

APPEAL from Byrne J.

On April 18, 1950, the plaintiff, James Rushton, then aged 36, who was employed by the defendants, the National Coal Board, at Cronton Colliery, Lancashire, tripped and fell over a sleeper, and his gloved right hand was caught up in the moving part of an overhead conveyor belt. His right arm with part of the scapula and muscles was torn from his body. In the result he became a one-armed man, and his injury was such that it was impossible to fix an artificial limb as there were no muscles to which to fasten it; he would always have to wear a bandage or pad over the injured part, and would require help in putting it on. He also suffered pain in the phantom limb. The plaintiff also suffered fractures of ribs which caused a pneumothorax followed by pneumonia, and though an X-ray examination showed no disease of the chest, the plaintiff had a cough, and one doctor who gave evidence at the trial said that there was a condition of chronic bronchitis.

The plaintiff was discharged after three weeks in hospital, and after about 11 weeks the defendants offered him work as a clerk at the colliery at a wage about the same as his pre-accident wage in the mine, and about 19s. less than the wage he would have been earning as a labourer in the mine at the date of the trial, namely, £7 5s. The defendants also awarded him a permanent pension of £120 a year. After 14 months as a clerk, however, the plaintiff set up a duplicating business of his own, though at the trial it was stated that the clerical position remained open to him.

Before the accident, the plaintiff had intended to make commercial art his main occupation, but after six years in the forces he had had some domestic trouble and had gone to work as a loader in the mine.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty under section 55 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. On June 27, 1952, Byrne J. gave judgment in his favour, holding that the defendants were in breach of the statutory duty which they owed to him. In assessing damages he said that money could not compensate for the plaintiff's loss of enjoyment or the curtailment of his ability to earn his living as a commercial artist, and taking into account the pension of £120 and the amount the plaintiff was then earning and might earn in the future, he awarded £10,000 damages, including agreed special damages of £83 14s. 4d.

The defendants appealed only against the amount of damages awarded.

bound to take every offer of work made to him; but this man after the accident had accepted work as a clerk, and as a clerk did earn, and could have continued to earn, as a clerk, wages almost as high as he was earning at the date of the accident; so that the loss of earnings was only a small part of the loss in this case. The out-of-pocket loss at the date of the trial was only some £83, and that was included in the general award of £10,000 damages.

When damages have to be assessed in a case of this kind there are many elements for consideration: the pain and suffering undergone and which may occur in the future; the loss of some of the amenities of life; the fact that a man with an injury of this kind will always require some measure of help, even though he may be able to earn considerable money. These are some of the matters which have to be taken into consideration, and another is the fact that his earnings will probably be less than they were before.

Mr. Gerald Gardiner directed our attention to a number of cases which have been decided in the courts recently, and submitted that, however one looked at this case, the award of £10,000 by way of damages was too high and was completely out of line with the decisions of this court and of judges of the Queen's Bench Division recently.

Mr. Wooll rightly pointed out that the circumstances of two different cases were not alike, and that little help was to be gained from looking at what a particular judge gave or what this court awarded in the case of a different injury or an injury of a different kind, and that, however much one tried, it was impossible to standardize damages. There is foundation for Mr. Wooll's remark that it is impossible to standardize damages.

I think myself that the matter was perhaps best put by Birkett L.J. in Bird v. Cocking & Sons Ld.[1] When the appeal to this court has been against the assessment of damages, we have been reminded time and again that we ought to interfere if the damages were so low that it could be said that there was a wholly erroneous estimate of damages; and, on the other hand, we have been reminded that we ought to interfere if the damages were inordinately high.

Birkett L.J. in Bird v. Cocking & Sons Ld.[2] said: "The assessment of damages in cases of personal injuries is, perhaps, one of the most difficult tasks which a judge has to perform, and certainly the task is no lighter when the appellate court is asked to reconsider the assessment made by a judge in the court below. The task is so difficult because the elements which must be considered in forming the assessment in any given case vary so infinitely from other cases that there can be no fixed and unalterable standard for assessing the amounts for those particular elements. Although there is no fixed and

" unalterable standard, the courts have been making these assess" ments over many years, and I think that they do form some
" guide to the kind of figure which is appropriate to the facts
" of any particular case, it being for the judge, or for the appellate " court if they are reviewing the matter, to consider the special " facts in each case; for I agree with Mr. Veale that one case " cannot really be compared with another. The only thing that " can be done is to show how other cases may be a guide, and
" when, therefore, a particular matter comes for review one of " the questions is, how does this accord with the general run " of assessments made over the years in comparable cases ?
" Judging by that test the sum which Streatfeild J. awarded " was quite at variance and was, indeed, much too high."

That passage expresses everything that I would say on the two views put before us in this court as to the use of other cases. It is impossible to standardize damages, but it is the duty of this court, so far as it can, when there is an appeal in this class of case, to see that the general principles are followed so far as possible, so that there may be, again, so far as is possible, the same approach in the cases of all litigants who suffer from personal injuries and for all defendants. More than that the court cannot do; and with that in mind I come back to the facts in this case.

[His Lordship reviewed the injuries sustained by the plaintiff and continued:] Bearing all those things in mind and giving full effect to them, I have reached the conclusion that the sum of £10,000 is much too high; and that it is the duty of this court to reduce it. Applying such tests as have been put to this court, and bearing in mind decisions in earlier cases and the special facts of this case, I cannot bring myself to say that the damages ought to have been more than £7,000.

I would accordingly order that the damages awarded to the plaintiff be reduced from the sum of £10,000 to the sum of £7,000, and I would allow the appeal to that extent.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion. This case affords another illustration of the difficulties which attend the assessment of damages where personal injuries are concerned, and the only question in this court has been this difficult question of damages. The House of Lords have used the phrase " a wholly " erroneous estimate of the damage " as one of the grounds on which an appellate court could interfere (Davies v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries Ltd.).[3] A phrase used by Lord Simon in a recent case (Nance v. British Columbia Electric Railway Co. Ltd.)[4] was that an appellate court could interfere if " the amount awarded is either so inordinately low or so inordi-
" nately high that it must be a wholly erroneous estimate of the "damage," and MacKinnon L.J. in another case (Greenfield v. London & North Eastern Ry. Co.)[5] spoke of damages being so excessive as to be unreasonable.

How those actual tests are to be applied is always a matter of some difficulty, because I can conceive that anyone hearing the history of this dreadful accident might say that no money could compensate the plaintiff, and that whatever sum a judge awarded could not be inordinately high. Indeed, Byrne J., at the conclusion of his judgment, said: "... this is a case in which "money cannot really compensate at all for the loss of enjoy- "ment or the curtailment of his ability to do what he would like "to do in the way of earning a living, and clearly it must be a "case in which the damages are substantial."

If money is no compensation, then £5,000, £10,000, £15,000 or £20,000 become meaningless, but the courts have been compelled by the logic of circumstances to decree that in cases of personal injury the only thing open to the court is to make an award of damages in money. That being so, I still think that it is a most useful thing to look at comparable cases to see what other minds have done, and so to gather the general consensus of opinion as to the amount which a man in a certain state of society ought to be awarded.

Here, as my Lord has pointed out, and, indeed, as Mr. Wooll, who treated this matter so frankly, said, the financial element is the least of all, as indeed it is; and he said that this sum can be justified on the award for loss of amenities, namely, the position of a man who can no longer conduct his life as he would wish to do; a man who in certain matters must always be dependent upon others, and who quite manifestly cannot do the things that he would like to do, such as running, playing cricket or football and taking part in athletic exercises. Mr. Wooll said that disregarding or treating the financial side as a minor matter, the sum could be justified because of the loss of amenities and the pain and suffering endured and still to be endured.

Having given this case anxious consideration, I have come to the same conclusion as my Lord. If one were freely to say, "Money can be no compensation," then awarding £10,000, £15,000 or £20,000 would be one thing; but this court, while it regards the decisions of the past, must also have regard to the future, and the effect that its decisions might possibly have in that direction; and taking all these matters into consideration, looking at the past cases, the general standard, and the particular facts in this case, I concur in the opinion that this sum is too high, and should be reduced to £7,000.

ROMER L.J. I also agree. The principle has been adopted (and it is the only possible principle which can be adopted) of trying to compensate a man in the plight in which this plaintiff finds himself by awarding what may fairly be described as notional or theoretical compensation to take the place of that which is not possible, namely, actual compensation. In the application of that principle the court should plainly, so far as possible, apply it with some degree of uniformity. One can only say "so far as possible," because nothing in the nature of any rigid classification can be achieved when one is dealing, not with fact, but with theory; and the only way, so far as I can see, in which one can achieve anything approaching a uniform standard, is by considering cases which have come before courts in the past and seeing what amounts were awarded in circumstances so far as may be comparable with the case which the court has to decide.

RUSHTON v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.
Romer L.J.

In the light of the guide afforded by the authorities to which we have been referred, it does seem to me that the £10,000 awarded in the present case is out of line with the standard which has in general been adopted in the past, and deviates from that standard to such a degree that I agree that the award cannot be sustained, and that £7,000 is the sum which should be awarded, and which would be in conformity with the trend of previous decisions. I therefore agree with the order which has been proposed.

Children and Young Persons — Need of care and protection — Moral delinquency—Issue of lack of proper parental care and guardianship —Parents unaware of boys' conduct—No evidence against parents— Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (23 Geo. 5, c. 12), ss. 61, 62.

Three boys under 17 years of age, whose parents had permitted them to play football, had intercourse with a young woman in one another's presence in a latrine on a football field. Two of the boys had had intercourse with her on previous occasions, but there was no evidence that the parents of any of the boys were aware of her existence or of the likelihood of her presence, or of the presence of any other undesirable female on the football field. Complaints were preferred against the boys and their parents under section 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, alleging that the boys, being young persons under 17 years of age, were in need of care and protection by reason of exposure to moral danger through their parents not exercising proper care and guardianship. The justices considered that the parents could not have given any or adequate instructions to the boys in standards of morality and behaviour and matters of sex as shown by the boys' conduct, and they held the complaints proved, and in each case made an order under section 62 (1) (d) placing the boy on probation, and a further order under section 62 (1) (c) that the parent should enter into a recognizance to exercise proper care and guardianship. On appeal by the boys and the parents:—

Held, that, although in some cases there might be such a persistent course of conduct by a young person that the only reasonable inference was that there was a lack of parental care and guardianship, there was no evidence before the justices from which such an inference could be drawn. The boys' conduct had for the first time been brought to their parents' attention, and the mere fact that the boys, unknown to their parents, had had intercourse with the young woman in question, irrespective of whether or not the boys had committed a crime, did not justify the conclusion that their parents were to blame, nor was such conduct, whether or not the parents had instructed the boys in matters of sex, necessarily due to lack of proper care and guardianship. The orders, accordingly, in respect of the boys as well as the parents, were set aside.

THREE CASES STATED by Gloucestershire justices sitting at Cheltenham.

Complaints were preferred against three boys and a parent of each under section 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933,[1] alleging in each case that the boy being a young person under the age of 17 years was in need of care and protection by reason of exposure to moral danger through his parents not exercising proper care and guardianship.

At the hearing of the complaints the following facts were proved or admitted:—On June 11, 1952, all three boys, then aged 16 years nine months, 16 years three months and 15 years three months respectively, committed indecent conduct by having, or in the case of one of the boys attempting to have, sexual intercourse with a girl, then aged 17 years and two months, in a latrine in a football field in the presence of each other. Two of the boys, with other youths, propelled the girl across the field against her will for that purpose, and she was not a consenting party to the indecent conduct. There were

S. 62: "(1) If a juvenile court is satisfied that any person brought before the court . . . is a child or young person in need of care or protection, the court may either—. . . (c) order his parent or guardian to enter into a recognisance to exercise proper care and guardianship; or (d) . . . in addition to making an order under . . . the last . . . paragraphs, make an order placing him for a specified period, not exceeding three years, under the supervision of a probation officer, . . ."

about 30 other boys aged between eight and 16 years in the field at the time, and the latrine was a makeshift corrugated iron structure affording little privacy. Two of the boys had known the girl for some time and had had intercourse with her on previous occasions, but none of them had had intercourse with any other woman. There was no evidence that the boys' parents knew of the existence of the young woman or had been warned in any way of the likelihood of her presence, or of the presence of any other undesirable female at or in the vicinity of the football field, or that they were aware, or should have been aware, that the giving of permission to their sons to play football at the place in question involved any likelihood that they would come into contact with any undesirable member of the opposite sex. There was no evidence that any of the parents had ever attracted the attention of the police by conduct involving a breach of the law or a neglect of the duties of a good citizen. There was no evidence either that the parents had, or that they had not, given any or adequate sexual instruction to the boys.

On behalf of the parents it was contended that the words "not exercising proper care and guardianship" in section 61 (1) of the Act included in their connotation an element of wilfulness on the part of the parent; that there was no evidence that the parents, on the occasions in question, failed to exercise proper care and guardianship, or, if the boys had been exposed to moral danger, that that was "through" the parent "not exercising "proper care and guardianship." Each of the parents stated that had he, or she, been aware of the possibility of moral danger to their respective sons from the girl in question they would have immediately taken energetic steps to deal with the situation. As to the boys, it was contended that, for the case to come within the provisions of sections 61 and 62 of the Act, the young person must be in need of care and protection at the time when brought before the court, and that even if they had been in need of care and protection at the time of the events complained of, they were not in such need when brought before the court, since now that their parents were aware of the existence of the young girl they would take steps to avoid their being exposed to moral danger; that, since the court possessed no inherent jurisdiction, any order purporting to be made under section 62 would be in excess of jurisdiction unless the justices were first satisfied that the facts brought the case within the terms of section 61, and that no such facts had been admitted or proved.

On behalf of the complainant it was contended that the facts proved showed that the boys were in need of care and protection by reason of exposure to moral danger through their parents not exercising proper care and guardianship.

The justices were of opinion that the parents could not have given any or adequate instruction to the boys in standards of morality and behaviour and matters of sex, as shown by the boys' conduct; and they held that it had been proved in each case that the boy was in need of care and protection by reason of exposure to moral danger through his parent not exercising proper care and guardianship, and in each case they made an order under section 62 (1) (d) placing the boy (with his consent) under the supervision of a probation officer for a period of two years, and made a further order under section 62 (1) (c) that the parent should enter into a recognizance in the sum of £5 to exercise proper care and guardianship.

BOWERS v. SMITH. EVANS v. SAME. FLACK v. SAME.

The parents and the boys appealed.

S. H. Noakes for the parents and the boys.
Geoffrey Smallwood for the complainant.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD GODDARD C.J. These three cases are stated by justices for the County of Gloucester sitting at Cheltenham, before whom the appellants, three boys and their parents, were brought, under section 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933.

Section 61 (1) of the Act of 1933 provides: "For the purposes "of this Act a child or young person in need of care or protection "means a person who is—(a) a child or young person who, "having no parent or guardian or a parent or guardian unfit to "exercise care and guardianship or not exercising proper care "and guardianship, is either falling into bad associations, or "exposed to moral danger, or beyond control." If the justices find that, they can, under section 62, do a variety of things, including what they did in this case, that is, put the young persons under the supervision of a probation officer. With regard to the parents, section 62 (1) provides that if the court "is "satisfied that any person brought before the court under this "section by a local authority, constable, or authorized person, "is a child or young person in need of care or protection, the "court may either—(a) order him to be sent to an approved "school; or (b) commit him to the care of any fit person, whether "a relative or not, who is willing to undertake the care of him; "or (c) order his parent or guardian to enter into a recognizance "to exercise proper care and guardianship."

The case raises the question whether in the particular circumstances the justices had power to make the order that they did make. The boys were brought before the court because a very nasty and disgusting state of affairs had come to the notice of the police. [His lordship referred to the facts and continued:] That was, of course, conduct of the most reprehensible character and deserving of some condign punishment, which one may hope that the parents will administer, but it is quite another thing to say that because these boys committed an offence of that sort, they did it because their parents had not exercised proper care and control over them. All that the parents had done was to send the boys to play football. [His lordship referred to the justices' findings and continued:] Of course, with regard to sexual instruction, parents are entitled to hold different views, and some consider that it is not desirable to give sexual instruction to boys at this age. Can it be said on those findings that there was any evidence before the court that the parents had not exercised proper care and guardianship? If boys are found to be repeatedly committing criminal or disgraceful acts, the court may well be justified in drawing the inference that parental discipline is wanting, and it ought not to be difficult to give some evidence from which the court can infer that, but to say that the fact that three young adolescents who have just come to puberty—I dare say sexually excited, and rather tempted—have had intercourse with a disreputable girl shows that the parents have been guilty of not exercising proper care and attention, seems to me to be going a great deal too far.

BOWERS v. SMITH. EVANS v. SAME. FLACK v. SAME.

Lord Goddard C.J.

The conclusion of the justices was: "We being of opinion "that the parent of the defendant could not have given any or "adequate instruction to the defendant in standards of morality "and behaviour and matters of sex as shown by his conduct in," and then they set out the filthy matters in which these boys had indulged. It is surely a very serious thing to say, even if it happens on two or three occasions with the same girl and the parents know nothing about it, that because young adolescents commit some sexual misbehaviour—whether it amounts to a crime or not is immaterial for this purpose—that is due to neglect on the part of their parents. I do not think that the section was ever meant to apply to cases like this. Of course, if evidence is given that a girl or a boy is being kept in a house where the mother is permitting prostitutes to assemble, or is housing them, or if the mother herself is a prostitute, or is obviously living a loose life, it is very proper that the children should be removed. But I fail to see that there is anything in the evidence which justified the conclusion at which the justices arrived, namely, that because the boys had been guilty of the conduct described and it had for the first time been brought to the attention of the parents, the parents were to blame. Nor, because the justices thought that the parents could not have given them sexual instruction, could it be said that they had not exercised proper care and guardianship. One knows that young adolescents among themselves, at schools and other places—many of them in all walks of life—commit indecent acts, and parents no doubt correct them if they know of it, but those things as a rule are done in strict secrecy. Although these acts against this girl were done in the presence of several other boys on a football field, which in one way makes the boys' behaviour all the more reprehensible, there is not the least suggestion that the parents had any idea of it at all. No one would say that it was in any way wrong to let the boys go to the field to play football. I cannot agree that merely because it is found that two of these boys had sexual intercourse with this girl on two or three occasions that that justified the justices in coming to the conclusion that the parents had not exercised proper care and attention.

BOWERS v. SMITH. EVANS v. SAME. FLACK v. SAME.

Accordingly, these three appeals must be allowed and the orders in respect of the boys as well as of the parents must be set aside.

CROOM-JOHNSON J. Sections 61 and 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, contain, in my judgment, most valuable provisions for the protection of young people and for bringing them up in the right way. It is because of that that I have approached this case with a good deal of anxiety, looking to see whether the express provisions of beneficent sections are likely to be spoiled by any observations which I may make on the decision of this case. But it must be remembered at the same time that, although not in respect of a criminal offence, the fact that some order may be made with regard to children of apparently quite respectable citizens makes it incumbent on the tribunal which has to deal with the matter to proceed with a high degree of caution. No one seems to have thought of the possibility in this case that adequate instruction may have been given by the parents and, as not infrequently happens with regard to parental advice, that the young people in question did not choose to take advantage of it or, perhaps, took no notice of it.

No doubt there are cases in which the justices may, from a persistent course of conduct by the young person, come to the conclusion that the only reasonable inference is that there must have been something lacking at home and neglect by the parents to discharge their duties. In those cases justices no doubt proceed most carefully and with due regard to the express provisions of the statute. In the present case it seems to me that there is no material from which the justices could draw that inference, if that is what they did, and I am not sure they did. When invited to draw an inference against a parent because of something his child has done, I venture to suggest that the justices should proceed with considerable caution.

I agree with what my Lord has said, and I think that in the present case, although no doubt with the best of motives and with every intention to preserve the character of these young persons for the future and prevent this sort of thing happening again, the justices have erred. I concur in the suggestion that these appeals should be allowed and the orders set aside.

PEARSON J. I agree with the judgments which have been delivered and I concur in the orders to be made.

Noakes applied for an order under section 39 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, that the names and addresses of the boys should not be published in a newspaper.

BOWERS v. SMITH. EVANS v. SAME. FLACK v. SAME.

LORD GODDARD C.J. In this sort of case we shall certainly not make any such order. The public may just as well know the shocking conduct of which these boys were guilty.

A gown manufacturer with a business in the East end of London lived for a number of years with his wife in a flat at Brighton, which was the property of the wife. The husband died in May, 1948; the wife in the following August. Both left wills, of which the plaintiffs were executors and trustees.

After the wife's death, quantities of banknotes and coin, amounting to some £5,944, were discovered in the flat; these were hidden in a number of unlikely and unsuitable places: inside a radiogram, under a kitchen cabinet, etc. There was no evidence as to the ownership of the money, or as to when, by whom, or for what reason it had been secreted.

On the hearing of a summons taken out for the determination of the question whether the money belonged to the husband's estate, or to the wife's, or to both estates, and if the latter in what proportions:—

money should be considered as subject to an equal and severable joint tenancy in the joint lifetime of the spouses; while after the death of one it would remain for the sole benefit of the survivor; in which event also the wife's estate was wholly entitled.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Max Cohen, a gown manufacturer carrying on business in the East End of London, and his wife Rebecca, lived at all material times in a flat at Brighton, which was the property of the wife. Both were almost illiterate, but the husband's business was highly successful. Both died in 1948, the husband in April, and the wife in August; both left wills, of which the plaintiffs were executors and trustees.

After the death of the wife it was discovered that banknotes and coin to the value of £5,944 13s. 6d. had been hidden in the flat. Bundles of notes were found in a number of peculiar and unlikely places, such as a space behind a water tank on the landing; a locked tin box behind a wardrobe; underneath a kitchen cabinet; and in a trunk containing female clothing. There was no evidence as to the origin of the money, or as to when, or by whom, or for what purpose the notes had been secreted in this way. It had, however, been ascertained, and was stated in affidavits, that the husband had, over a number of years, withdrawn many thousands of pounds from his business; and that the wife, about a year before her death, had withdrawn some £1,500 from a bank deposit account.

After the death of the wife a number of questions arising out of the two wills fell to be decided; Wynn-Parry J., who heard the summons, gave certain directions now immaterial, and ordered an inquiry in chambers as to the question whether the notes and coin discovered in the flat belonged to the estate of the testator or to that of the testatrix, or partly to one estate and partly to the other, and if so, in what proportions. At the conclusion of the inquiry the master found himself quite unable to answer the question, owing to the lack of definite evidence, and concluded his certificate by leaving the question for the court.

associated with magpies. They hid their money all over the flat in unsuitable situations, and, in all, a sum of £5,994 13s. 6d. was found hidden there.

The neighbours who were living on other floors of the same building disclaimed any knowledge of what was happening. Whether the husband and wife were none too sure of the solvency of banks, or of the Post Office; what they were doing, whether they were keeping it where they did because it seemed to be the safest place to keep it; whether it was money which represented the proceeds of the sale of some property; how long they had had it; where it came from; why they hid it; what they were doing with it and what their purpose was, nobody seems to have any idea; and we are left with the bare fact that on the death of Rebecca Cohen all this money was hidden away in most unsuitable situations in the flat in which the parties had resided.

It is the kind of human story which invites speculation; and I could, I think, make some fairly ingenious guesses as to what might be the explanation of it all; but there is no kind of real certitude in the matter. There are certain circumstantial details about the hiding; for instance, some of the notes were wrapped in black cotton material similar to that used in the loud-speaker of the radiogram. Apparently the notes, after they were discovered, were paid into a bank or otherwise disposed of without careful inspection, but from the evidence, so far as it goes, it would seem they were ordinary, fairly dirty notes; the sort of collection of notes which might have been made from time to time.

I have looked at the affidavits which were before the master to see if I could find anything more in them than he was able to find, but I have come to much the same conclusion that he did, which is that there is really nothing to throw any light on the mystery, for a mystery it is.

Now, with the conflicting claims of the beneficiaries under the two wills, I have somehow or other to decide to which estate this money belongs. Nobody can say that it is res nullius, an expression used in Sinclair v. Brougham [1]; it must belong to someone; and as I cannot hold that it is res nullius it is obvious that no claimants other than the beneficiaries of the two estates could be heard to assert any right to this money.

First of all, as a question of fact, there is not the slightest indication to whom this money belonged. There is no suggestion that the husband and wife, who, as I was told, were living together in perfect amity, ever made any agreement about it between themselves. Not only is there no kind of evidence as to the source of this money, but there is none as to what was the purpose of the owner of it in depositing it in this extraordinary way in various places in the common conjugal dwelling.

Sometimes the only way out of a difficulty of this kind is to treat the claimants as entitled in equal shares, and that is a solution which has been adopted on many occasions by the court; but there is one material fact to which I must now refer, which is this: this house, No. 19 Montpelier Villas, was the freehold property of the wife; that is to say, the legal estate was in her. Whether she held as nominee or trustee for her husband, whether they had made any arrangement as between themselves for a tenancy or anything of that kind, I do not know; but the fact is that she was the legal owner of the house in which they lived and in which this money was found.

There is a consistent line of authority which shows that there is a legal presumption that the owner of land is the owner of chattels found on the land; and for that the authority is South Staffordshire Water Company v. Sharman.[2] The headnote is as follows: "The possessor of land is generally entitled, as against "the finder, to chattels found on the land. The defendant, while "cleaning out, under the plaintiffs' orders, a pool of water on "their land,"—that is the well known Minster Pool at Lichfield —"found two rings. He declined to deliver them to the plain- "tiffs, but failed to discover the real owner. In an action of "detinue:—Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the rings." The judgment of Lord Russell of Killowen C.J. concludes with these words[3]: "the general principle seems to me to be that "where a person has possession of house or land, with a manifest "intention to exercise control over it and the things which may "be upon or in it, then, if something is found on that land, "whether by an employee of the owner or by a stranger, the "presumption is that the possession of that thing is in the owner "of the locus in quo."

A further authority dealing with the point is Johnson v. Pickering,[4] in which this passage occurs in the judgment of Lawrance J.[5]: "The tendency of modern authorities is to make "an intention to possess the test, in the absence of more direct "evidence, of actual possession." Then South Staffordshire Water Company v. Sharman[6] was cited, and I think cited with approval.

The questions of possession, of what amounts to possession, from what possession may be inferred, and when possession can be deemed to indicate ownership, are questions as to which there is much authority and may be much controversy. Certain principles are laid down, for instance, in Mason v. Lickbarrow,[7] which contains a passage[8] where it is said: "Possession of "goods is prima facie evidence of title; but that possession may "be precarious, as of a deposit; it may be criminal, as of a thing

"stolen; it may be qualified, as of things in the custody of a "servant, carrier, or a factor. Mere possession without a just "title gives no property, and the person to whom such possession "is transferred by delivery must take his hazard of the title of "his author."

The question of possession of property as between husband and wife has been adverted to and decided in many cases, especially, of course, since the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (see Ramsay v. Margrett [9] and Youngs v. Youngs [10]).

The possession being ambiguous in one sense, because the husband and wife were both living in the house, it may be, of course, that these notes were put there between the death of the husband and that of the wife; but that does not seem at all likely; and assuming that they were placed there during the joint lives, then one may say that the possession of them as goods in the house is entirely ambiguous. Nobody can say, as between the husband and wife, to which of them the lawful possession must be attributed; and it is suggested and submitted that the principle which I have indicated, which depends, I think, largely upon the authority of the South Staffordshire case,[11] strange though it may appear and slight as may be the straw which has to be grasped by the swimmer in this sea of ambiguity, must determine the issue in this matter, as there is nothing better to depend on.

I adopt this principle with reluctance, because it seems to me to be a somewhat inhuman way of approaching the problem; but I cannot bring myself to believe that there is any solution which I could accept as so likely, probable, or convincing that it could override what has been laid down to be a principle of law to resort to if there is nothing else to guide one. On the whole, it seems to me that I must follow that case, and hold that the money belonged to the wife. As I have said, we know nothing of the facts; but, in any case, the notes were in the flat when the wife died; and if they were placed there in the husband's lifetime then they were placed by one of two spouses on and in property which belonged to one of them; and I think that I must decide that these notes and coin were the property not of the husband but of the wife.

I have said that I regard this as rather an inhuman approach to the matter, and if I could have decided the case on a ground a little (if I may say so) more picturesque than one which depends on the ownership of the legal estate in the premises, I should have been very glad to do so. It was suggested that useful guidance was afforded by a recent decision of my own,

Jones v. Maynard,[12] approved in the Court of Appeal in Rimmer v. Rimmer,[13] a case which was also helpful.

In the former case I came to the conclusion (which I cite without hesitation because my decision was later approved) that where a husband and wife have what is called a "joint purse," and the purposes for which the joint purse was formed come to an end, the proper way for a court of equity to deal with the money is not to investigate the precise sources out of which the fund was built up, but to assume that the intention was an equal division of what was left. I am bound to say that the analogy of that case does not seem to be applicable to the present facts, because I am rather disposed to think, if speculation be possible, that the most likely history of this deposit was that the husband and wife put the notes aside with a view to providing for the survivor of them. I am not suggesting that there was any intention to conceal assets from the Revenue authorities, but it may well be that during the perilous times of the war it was thought advisable to have a large sum of cash at hand in case the husband, in particular, should meet with sudden death, leaving the wife to maintain herself; and, of course, the same point would arise if the survivor were the husband.

I should rather suppose that, in such a case, the presumption would be not for a division but for an equality of ownership, in this sense: that the nest-egg (if it may be so described) was intended to remain intact for the benefit of the survivor after the death of one of the spouses; and applying Jones v. Maynard,[14] so far as it ought to be applied, I should be disposed to think that if the principle of equality applied, it only applied to this extent—that, while the ownership of the fund might be presumed to be one of equality between the spouses, their interest in it was probably that of a severable joint tenancy, so that if they wanted to divide up the fund in their joint lifetimes they could have done so, but if they did not desire so to divide it then the fund would remain for the benefit of the survivor. As I have said, I do not like to suggest that there was any intention here of concealment of assets from the notice of the Revenue authorities; but I should have drawn the deduction that this fund was intended to remain for the benefit of the survivor of the two, without any right of participation in it after death by that one of them who should happen first to die.

If that is the view—and I must say that I only put it as an alternative to the main point on which I have decided the case, unsatisfactory though that point is—the result would be exactly the same. The wife having survived, if the arrangement was as I have described it, she would be entitled to the fund as survivor. However, I base my decision primarily on the point which I mentioned first; but in case I am held to be wrong in a higher court, I should desire to add as an alternative reason for deciding in favour of the estate of the wife rather than that of the husband, that if it were possible now to draw a deduction from one's knowledge of human nature and one's fancy in drawing pictures from very inadequate material, I should hold that this was a fund intended to be divisible, if desired, during the joint lives of the spouses, but intended otherwise to enure for the benefit of the survivor. On that view, also, the wife's estate would be entitled to my judgment.

In answer to the question raised by the summons, which was in these terms, whether, having regard to the master's certificate, the executors may deal with the notes and coin on the footing either that the whole was the property of the testator or that the whole was the property of the testatrix, or that the notes and coin belonged to both, I will declare that the whole was the property of the testatrix; and I will so declare not merely having regard to the certificate of the master, but to the evidence filed on this question which is mentioned in that certificate.

Road Traffic—Drunk in charge of motor-cycle—Intention of friends to prevent defendant riding—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 15.

The defendant was found by the police in an intoxicated condition in the rear yard of a motor garage within about five feet of a motor-cycle. The defendant was charged with being in charge of the motor-cycle when under the influence of drink. The justices found that his presence near the motor-cycle was involuntary, as he was brought there by friends to get water, and that the friends intended and would have been able to stop him from riding the cycle. The justices were not satisfied that he really intended to ride it, and found him not guilty. The prosecutor appealed:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that on the facts the defendant was in charge of the motor-cycle, since he had not given it into somebody else's charge.

[Reported by Miss C. J. ELLIS, Barrister-at-Law.]

1953

HAINES v. ROBERTS.

CASE STATED by Monmouthshire justices.

The prosecutor, John Haines, preferred an information before the justices sitting at Abergavenny against Haydn George Roberts, alleging that he, on July 18, 1952, at Abergavenny was under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of a motor-cycle of which he was in charge, contrary to section 15 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

At the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted. On the evening of July 18, 1952, the defendant rode to Abergavenny and left his motor-cycle in the rear yard of a garage belonging to a motor company, which was a public place, and then went drinking. At about 10 p.m. some friends met him and asked him how he was going to get home; he told them that he was waiting for some other friends and wanted a drink. They took him to the rear yard of the garage, where there was a water tap, and after he had taken a drink they doused his head under the tap. The defendant then went to sleep until about 11.30 p.m. While he was asleep his friends tried to make some arrangements, of which the defendant was unaware, for another person to ride the cycle home and tell the defendant's father to come and fetch him. At 11.55 p.m., before the arrangements were completed, the police came along and found the defendant swaying backwards and forwards, clinging to an upright steel standard in the rear yard of the garage about five feet from his cycle. They saw the defendant's friends but did not have any conversation with them. The defendant was asked by the police if the motor-cycle was his, and he replied: "That is my bike, you leave it alone." He was also asked if he intended to ride the cycle in his condition, and he said, "If I "want to ride that bike I will ride it and no one in town will stop "me." The police assisted the defendant to the police station, where he was examined by the police surgeon, and was later charged under caution and he replied: "I was not in charge of "any bloody bike." The defendant's friends intended to look after him from shortly after 10 p.m. Having tried without success to sober him up, they intended to prevent him from riding his motor-cycle home. If other arrangements failed they were going to walk him home.

The justices found that the defendant was under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control over a motor-vehicle. After considering a number of Scottish decisions, the justices came to the conclusion that the defendant had not been a free agent because (1) his presence near the motor-cycle was involuntary as he was brought there by his friends to get water, and (2) the defendant's friends intended, and would have been able, to stop the defendant from riding or attempting to ride his cycle. They also were not satisfied that the defendant really intended to ride his motor-cycle, and considered that his remarks in that connexion were in the nature of defiance of authority and drunken bravado. They accordingly found the defendant not guilty.

The prosecutor appealed.

Arthur G. Davies for the prosecutor.
James Campbell for the defendant.

The following Scottish decisions were cited in argument:—Crichton v. Burrell [1]; Dean v. Wishart [2]; Adair v. M'Kenna.[3]

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts and continued: How can it be said under those circumstances that the defendant was not in charge of the motor-cycle? He had not put it into anybody else's charge. It may be that, if a man goes to a public house and leaves his car outside or in the car park and, getting drunk, asks a friend to look after the car for him or to take it home, he has put it in charge of somebody else; but if he has not put it in charge of somebody else he is in charge until he does. His car is out on the road or in the car park—it matters not which—and he is in charge. Some day, perhaps, the question will arise whether, if the car is in a car park where there is an attendant, the attendant is in charge. Whether he will be in charge will no doubt be a question of fact.

The justices gave a great deal of attention to this case and had certain Scottish decisions cited to them. They have also been cited to us but, of course, are not binding on us, and I think that some of those cited are clearly distinguishable. But here it is clear that the defendant was in charge of the cycle, and until he had given it into somebody else's charge he remained in charge. He was not charged with driving while under the influence of drink.

Under these circumstances the case must go back to the justices with an intimation that the offence was proved.

CROOM-JOHNSON J. I am of the same opinion and for the same reasons.

The plaintiff company proposed to carry out a transaction whereby certain freehold and leasehold properties were to be purchased from L. Ld. in consideration of the issue to L. Ld. of 400,000 ordinary shares of £1 each fully paid and £750,000 debenture stock of the plaintiff company, the stock being redeemable at the latest in 1980, with provision for redemption at an earlier date.

The plaintiff company took out a summons for the determination of the question whether it was entitled, without the consent of the Treasury, to issue the shares and stock in question, without contravening any provision of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946,[1] or the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947.[2]

LONDON AND COUNTRY COMMERCIAL PROPERTIES INVESTMENTS LD. v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

The plaintiff company, London and Country Commercial Property Investments Ld. [" the property company "] proposed to issue shares and debenture stock, as a consideration for the purchase of certain freehold and leasehold properties. The proposed transaction was authorized by a special resolution of the company passed on November 22, 1951, and was contained in a draft agreement and a draft trust deed.

The agreement was made between Littlewoods Mail Order Stores Ld. [" Littlewoods "] of the first part, the property company of the second part, the Alliance Assurance Company Ld. [" the trustee company "] of the third part, and the companies whose names and addresses of whose registered offices were set forth in the first and second columns respectively of the first schedule [" the purchasing companies "] of the several other parts.

By clause 1: " Littlewoods hereby agree to sell and the " property company hereby agrees to purchase for the considera- " tion mentioned in clause 2 hereof " certain freehold and leasehold properties which were described in the second schedule to the agreement.

By clause 2: " The consideration for the said sale shall be the " issue by the property company to Littlewoods or its nominee " or nominees of (a) 400,000 ordinary shares of £1 each in the " capital of the property company credited as fully paid up and " (b) £750,000 debenture stock of the property company referred " to in clause 3 hereof to be created and issued as fully paid by " the property company."

By clause 3: " The stock may be issued to such persons at " such times and on such terms and either at par or a discount " as the company may think fit."

Clause 4 provided for the issue of the stock certificates which were to be in the form set out in the first schedule.

By clauses 6 and 7 the company mortgaged and created a floating charge on the freehold and leasehold properties the subject-matter of the transaction to the trustees as security for the issue of the stock.

There then followed in subsequent clauses the usual provisions enabling the trustees to realise the properties after the security became enforceable and to hold the proceeds of realisation on trust, after payment of costs and other proper expenses, for the holders of the debenture stock.

The form of the stock certificate was set out in the first schedule to the deed. It provided that interest was payable at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum and the conditions endorsed thereon provided that the stock was to be redeemed at par together with accrued interest in 1980; but subject to the provision that the company should establish a cumulative sinking fund for the redemption of 1 per cent. of the stock outstanding at any moment and that the sinking fund was to be used each year either to purchase the stock at or under par in the market or to redeem the stock by annual drawings. There followed a power whereby at any time on or after January 1, 1962, the company might redeem the stock at 101 per cent.

By clause 20 (b) of the second schedule to the deed a meeting of the stockholders was empowered by extraordinary resolution to sanction the exchange of the stock for the conversion of the stock into shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock or other obligations or securities of the company or any other company formed or to be formed.

The plaintiff company took out the present summons for the determination of the question whether it was entitled, without the consent of the Treasury, to issue 400,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and £750,000 debenture stock of the company (such stock to be constituted secured by and redeemable in accordance with the provisions contained in the draft of the trust deed) by way of consideration for the acquisition by the company of certain freehold and leasehold properties without contravening any provision of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946, or the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947.

UPJOHN J. [after stating the facts:] This is a summons under Order 54A seeking a construction of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946, and the Control of Borrowing Order, 1947, which was made under the powers conferred upon the Treasury by the Act. The Act and the order provide that certain financial transactions can only be carried out with Treasury approval, and the question which I have to consider is whether a proposed transaction requires Treasury approval upon the true construction of the Act and the order.

In a case where Treasury approval is required and is not given, serious penalties are imposed by the Act; large fines may be imposed, and upon indictment imprisonment up to a maximum of two years may be inflicted upon the offender; but it is expressly provided that the legal rights of the parties under any prohibited transaction are not to be affected. I therefore had serious doubts whether this court ought to exercise the powers which it undoubtedly has under Order 54A to make a declaration as to the rights of the parties, for that is a matter which must ultimately be tested in the criminal courts.

However, the Attorney-General, through Mr. Buckley, has said that this is a point of general importance, and that he has no objection to my determining the matter, and that he thought that such determination would be of assistance. In those circumstances, although the parties must recognize that my decision will not be binding on any criminal court, I think it right to entertain this application.

The proposed transaction is quite simple, and although there are necessarily a number of blanks in the proposed agreement, I think that the right course is for me to treat it as though it were an actual agreement and to consider whether, on the footing that it is an actual agreement, it infringes the provisions of the Act and the order.

[His Lordship referred to the draft agreement, and continued:] That, then, is the transaction. It is perfectly simple, providing for the purchase by the property company of certain freehold and leasehold properties in consideration of an issue of debenture stock and of shares which were to be issued as fully paid. I must, however, turn to the debenture trust deed for, as Mr. Buckley has rightly submitted, it is referred to, and, indeed, attached to the agreement, and therefore must be read as one with the agreement to see what is the true nature of the transaction between the parties.

[His Lordship referred to the draft trust deed, and continued:] So there was a perfectly simple transaction, a purchase of land, in consideration of the issue of debenture stock and fully paid-up shares, the debenture stock being redeemable at the latest in 1980, with provisions for redemption at an earlier date by purchase in the market, by drawings, or by a compulsory redemption at premium at any time after 1962.

That is the transaction which it is said infringes the provisions of the Borrowing (Control and Guarantees) Act, 1946, and the order made thereunder. I must therefore turn to the Act and consider its terms. Its title is: "An Act to provide for the "regulation of the borrowing and raising of money, the issue of "securities, and the circulation of offers of securities for sub-"scription, sale or exchange, to enable the Treasury to guarantee "loans in certain circumstances, and for purposes connected with "the matters aforesaid." [His Lordship read sections 1 (1), (3); 4 (1), (2); and paragraphs 1, 3 (1), (3) of the schedule to the Act, and continued:] The Treasury under the powers conferred under that Act made an order dated May 21, 1947, which came into operation on June 16, 1947. Part I is in these terms:

the headnote is, "General extent of control." Under that, "Borrowing in Great Britain." [His Lordship referred to articles 1, 2, 8 of the order, and continued:] The correspondence, to which I need not refer in detail, makes it clear that the whole of the Treasury case upon this matter depends upon bringing the transaction within the extended definition of the borrowing of money contained in section 4 of the Act, and in article 2 of the order made thereunder. It is not suggested that the issue of securities infringes any part of the order. There was, of course, in the Act ample power given which would enable the Treasury to have prohibited in express terms the issue of securities upon a transaction such as this. It is equally clear and, indeed, it is not disputed, that in section 4 (2) of the Act there is no prohibition of the issue of securities in a transaction such as this.

Upon these relevant sections, therefore, there is this to be said: section 4 of the Act and article 2 of the order are in substantially similar terms, but there are two differences. In the Act there is a reference in section 4 (2) (a) to "the whole or "any part of the price of any property." In the order, in article 2 (1) (b) the reference is to "the price" without any qualifying words. The only other difference is that, although the power given by section 4 (2) (a) of the Act is in general terms, in the order prohibition is only against arrangements whereby the sum allowed to remain unpaid is charged on the property.

In construing these two provisions I must have in mind section 31 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, which provides that in an order made under powers conferred by an Act, the same words must have the same meanings unless a contrary intention appears.

The first question that I have to consider is what are the principles of construction which I must adopt in construing this Act and this order. On that question a number of authorities have been cited to me by the parties. First of all, I have to bear in mind that this is a penal statute. It indeed, I suppose, represents the high-water mark of the Parliamentary invasion of the traditional rights of the subjects of this realm. Not only does it impose upon offenders substantial penalties—no objection could be taken to that—but what is so serious from the point of view of the subject is, that where a body corporate has been found to be an offender, then every director, general manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, including a person who was purporting to act in those capacities, is deemed to be guilty unless he prove that the offence was committed without his consent or connivance, thereby reversing the usual and traditional rule of English law that a man is innocent until he is proved guilty. But not only that; for proof that he is innocent will not avail an accused person, because he must further show that he exercised all such diligence to prevent the commission of the offence as he ought to have exercised, having regard to the nature of his functions in that capacity, and in all the circumstances. However, that is what Parliament has thought fit to enact, and I abide, of course, by it. Nevertheless it is what Mr. Lindon described as a highly penal statute.

In those circumstances, what are the canons of construction to be adopted? I do not propose to refer to the authorities at length. I think that the proper approach to the construction of such a statute as this is that I must construe it as I would any other instrument, that is to say, I must look at all the surrounding circumstances, I must look at the mischief intended to be remedied, I must above all give effect to the words that have been used in the section. That is plain from the decision in Dyke v. Elliott,[1] see, in particular, the judgment of James L.J., but if on construing the relevant sections of the Act and the order there appears any reasonable doubt or ambiguity, then being a penal statute I must apply the principles laid down succinctly by Lord Esher in Tuck & Sons v. Priester.[2] In the course of his judgment he said[3]: "But then comes the "question whether the plaintiffs are also entitled to recover "penalties under section 6. We must be very careful in "construing that section, because it imposes a penalty. If "there is a reasonable interpretation which will avoid the penalty "in any particular case we must adopt that construction. If "there are two reasonable constructions we must give the more "lenient one. That is the settled rule for the construction of "penal sections."

There is another principle which I must have in mind, and that is that a person is entitled so to order his affairs as to avoid the provisions of the order. This is a genuine transaction; there is nothing colourable about it. The question which I have to determine is whether upon the true construction of the Act and upon the true interpretation of the acts and deeds of the parties in their transaction, that transaction falls fairly and squarely within the provisions of the Act and the order. In St. Aubyn v. Attorney-General[4] Lord Simonds states it thus[5] (he was there considering a taxing Act, but his remarks apply, in my respectful view, a fortiori to a penal statute): "The question is "not at what transaction the section is, according to some alleged "general purpose, aimed but what transaction its language, "according to its natural meaning, fairly and squarely hits." I have to see whether, construing the Act and the order, and giving the words their natural meaning, the Act and the order fairly and squarely hits this transaction.

The case has rightly been elaborately argued before me, and I am indebted to counsel for their careful submissions and for their painstaking researches into the authorities. In a matter of this sort there has naturally been much reference to hypothetical cases, and I have been referred to a number of authorities dealing with those hypothetical cases. I think, however, that in a case of this nature that it is undesirable for me to go outside the particular transaction which I have to consider. The arguments, as I have stated, have been elaborate. I do not propose to review them, because, in my opinion, this case depends on a very few words in the Act and in the order.

I refer then once more to the Act, and in particular to section 4 (2): "Any reference in this Act to the borrowing of "money—(a) includes a reference to the making of any arrange- "ment by which a sum which would otherwise be payable at any "date is payable at a later date." It seems to me that what the Act is aiming at is the borrowing of further money in order to repay existing creditors. Of course, another way of dealing with the matter is to persuade existing creditors to permit repayment at a later date. Therefore, no borrowing in the sense in which that word is normally used is present there, but the Act plainly hits that sort of arrangement. The section continues: "and includes "in particular"—those words are important, because while I find it unnecessary to decide whether those words show that what follows falls within and is a particular example of what has gone before, at all events it does show that the Act is now about to deal with a case closely analogous to that which has gone before —"the making of any arrangement by which the whole or any "part of the price of any property is allowed to remain unpaid." Accordingly, what has to be found is an arrangement whereby the price of the property is allowed to remain unpaid.

It is conceded by Mr. Buckley that in an Act of this sort the reference to "price" is appropriate only to a cash or money consideration, using money in the strict sense of cash; it is not appropriate to describe some consideration other than cash. What do I have to find in order that the Act should cover the present transaction? I have to find a contract of sale and purchase for cash, and an arrangement by which that cash is to remain unpaid.

I do not think that I need refer in any detail to the order, because with the exceptions which I have just mentioned the words are exactly the same. I look then at the transaction. Is this a transaction which has a cash consideration which is allowed to remain unpaid? With all respect to the arguments of Mr. Buckley, I should have thought that this was quite plainly described in legal language as a transaction for a consideration which consisted in the issue of debentures. The Act plainly draws a distinction between issue of securities and the borrowing of money. The order makes the differences even plainer, as appears from the various cross-headings to which I have referred. This can only be made a transaction for a cash consideration which is allowed to remain unpaid by saying that on looking at the transaction as a whole one finds that on the true construction of the deed a sum of cash is to be paid in the future, and that a consideration of £750,000 is to be allowed to remain unpaid until 1980, or such earlier time as the security is redeemed under the provisions to which I have referred.

In my opinion it would be putting a most strange and unnatural construction on the words of this section and the corresponding article of the order to say that they covered the present transaction. There is, in fact, no cash consideration here at all. No money is being allowed to remain unpaid. This is quite a different transaction. This is a transaction in consideration of the issue of a series of debenture stock secured by a debenture trust deed. Under the terms of that trust deed, moneys, of course, become payable from time to time to the holders from time to time of the stock certificates. How that can be said to be " allowing money to remain unpaid," when in effect all that is being considered is a section and regulation which extends the meaning of the word " borrowing," I do not understand. It would have been perfectly easy, as I have already pointed out, for the Treasury, by making appropriate orders, to have dealt with this type of transaction. They have not thought fit to do so, and in my judgment they can bring this transaction within the section and the regulation in question only by giving to that section and to that regulation a most strange and unnatural construction.

It follows, therefore, if the Treasury are wrong in that view, that this transaction does not infringe the Control of Borrowing Order. At the same time, I think, having regard to the facts to which I have already referred, that this is really a question for the criminal courts, and that in consequence the declaration ought to be very narrow. I therefore propose to declare that the proposed arrangement is not a transaction whereby the price of any property is allowed to remain unpaid within the meaning of article 2 (1) (b) of the Control of Borrowing Order, 1946.

* OSBORNE v. SNOOK.

[1952. H. No. 3293.]

County Court—Jurisdiction—Landlord and tenant—Application for new tenancy—Required particulars not given—Leave to amend—County Court Rules, 1936 (as amended in 1951), Pt. 2, Ord. 40A, Form 342A—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (14 & 15 Geo. 6, c. 38), s. 10.

Compliance with the provisions relating to a tenancy set out in Form 342A, appended to Order 40A of Part 2 of the County Court Rules, 1936 (as amended in 1951), is not a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of the county court in an application by a tenant for a new tenancy under section 10 of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, and if the circumstances justify it leave to amend the application should be granted.

APPEAL from Judge Armstrong, sitting at Poole County Court.

The applicant, Mrs. Madeline Marie Osborne, as the sole executrix of Annie Butler Harvey, deceased, whose lease of the Post Office at Upton, Poole, in the county of Dorset, was due to expire on September 29, 1952, applied to the county court judge on August 28, 1952, by originating application under section 10 of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951,[1] for the grant of a new tenancy of the shop and living accommodation. The application was opposed by the landlord, Mr. A. G. W. Snook, and on November 5 was dismissed by the judge on the ground that the particulars given in the application did not comply with Form 342A appended to Order 40A of Part 2 of the County Court Rules, 1936,[2] as amended in 1951, and the

[1] Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (1): "The provisions of this part of this "Act shall have effect for enabling the "occupier of a shop under a tenancy "to which this section applies . . . to "apply to the court for, and subject "to the provisions of this Act to ob-"tain, the grant of a new tenancy "where apart from the next following "section the expiring tenancy would "come to an end immediately before "the date of the commencement of "this Act or within the period of two "years beginning with that date, and "would so come to an end by effluxion "of time or by the expiration of a "notice to quit. . . ."

Subs. (2) provides that the section applies to a tenancy which "(a) con-"sists of a shop, or (b) consists of a "shop and of living accommodation "occupied wholly or mainly by the "tenant or by a person who is em-"ployed by the tenant for the pur-"poses of the retail trade or business "carried on in the shop, . . ."

S. 11 (1) provides: "An application "under this part of this Act for the "grant of a new tenancy shall—(a) if "apart from this section the expiring "tenancy would expire by effluxion of "time, not be made later than one "month before the date on which that "tenancy would so expire."

[2] County Court Rules, 1936, Part 2, Ord. 40A, r. 2: "Proceedings in "a county court under this Act" [Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951] "shall be com-"menced by originating application "and the rules relating to originating "applications shall apply subject to "the modifications contained in this "Order . . . (7) the forms in the "appendix relating to proceedings "under this Act shall be used in the "cases to which they are applicable application was therefore bad in form. The judge also refused to permit the applicant to amend the application.

The applicant appealed.

E. S. Fay and P. Back, for the applicant.
J. T. Molony, for the landlord.

The cases cited in argument were referred to in the judgments.

SOMERVELL L.J., having read the material sections of the Act and County Court Rules, continued: There had been negotiations between the parties before the alleged application, but they had not resulted in any agreement. The lease was due to expire on September 29, 1952, and the application was made on August 28. The question is whether that application was an application within the Act. It admittedly did not set out all the particulars as stated in Form 342A. It set out that the premises contained a shop and dwelling-house, but it did not set out, as required by paragraph (h) (i) and (ii) of the form, the extent of that living accommodation and whether "occupied by the "tenant or by a person employed by the tenant for the purposes "of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop." There was no suggestion here that the shop or the house was separate within the provisions to which I have referred, so I need not read the part of the form which relates to that. The application also did not state what is required by (k), the "period, rent and other "terms and conditions of the new tenancy for which you are "applying." Those are the two important matters, though there may have been other minor matters.

It was submitted in the court below, as is clear from the judge's note, that the application to amend should be rejected on the same ground that an application to amend is rejected where the Limitation Act, or the Public Authorities Protection Act applies. The judge was referred, as we were, to Marshall v. London Passenger Transport Board.[1] We were also referred to another case, where amendment was allowed, Collins v. Hertfordshire County Council.[2] In the former of those cases what it was sought to bring in by amendment was a claim based on a breach of statutory duty, whereas it appeared (though the actual words of the writ do not appear in the report) that the writ, which was,

"with such variations, if any, as may "be required."

Form 342A: "The following are the "particulars of the expiring tenancy "of the premises:—(a) address of "premises, (b) date of lease or agree-"ment for tenancy, (c) names of "parties to lease or agreement, (d) "term granted by lease or agreement, "(e) rent reserved by lease or agree-"ment, (f) date and mode of termina-"tion of tenancy, (g) nature of the "retail trade or business carried on in "the premises by the tenant, (h) if "the expiring tenancy includes living "accommodation, state, (i) the extent "of the accommodation, and (ii) "whether the accommodation is occu-"pied by the tenant or by a person "employed by the tenant for the pur-"poses of the retail trade or business "carried on in the shop; . . . , (k) state "period, rent and other terms and "conditions of the new tenancy for "which you are applying."

of course, issued in time, was for negligence at common law only. The court held that the amendment introduced a new case which, if set up in an action commenced at the date of the amendment, would have been barred by lapse of time, and the amendment must be disallowed. In Collins v. Hertfordshire County Council [2] the amendment was allowed on the ground that it was no more than an amendment of the particulars of the cause of action indorsed on the writ. That indicates the dividing line between those two cases.

We were also referred to the decision of Donovan J. in British and Colonial Furniture Co. Ld. v. William McIlroy Ld.[3] In that case a somewhat similar point was raised under section 4 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, which provides: "The "tenant of a holding to which this part of this Act applies shall, "if a claim for the purpose is made in the prescribed manner" be entitled to certain things. Under section 25, "the expression "'prescribed' means prescribed by County Court Rules," or the High Court rules if there were High Court proceedings. The manner was prescribed by rules, but the application did not in an essential matter fulfil what was prescribed. Donovan J. decided that no application had been made in the prescribed manner and that the tenants were, therefore, debarred from proceeding with their claim. If I may say so, with respect, I follow that decision and agree with it, because the effect of the words used in that section seems to me to be that one must read into the section the actual form prescribed by the rules, and the Act is imperative that the application must be made within a certain time in that form and manner. There are no such words in this Act. I have come to the conclusion that the principle of Marshall's case [4] and the case to which I have just referred does not apply to this statute.

It was submitted on behalf of the landlord, as it was submitted to the county court judge and accepted by him, as I read his notes, that compliance with all the various matters set out in the form was a condition precedent to an application under the Act. I do not think that that is the proper construction of the Act, together with the rules made under it. The Act, of course, is the governing instrument, though it may be that questions might arise as to the limits of the rule-making power if the rules had purported to establish conditions precedent other than those which could be gathered from a perusal of the Act alone. In my opinion that question does not arise, because I find nothing in the rules which could be construed in that way. I think that under the Act there must be, not later than one month before the date on which the tenancy would expire, an application to the court which, in ordinary language, is an application for a new lease under this Act. I think that the document which we have before us here comes within that description. I do not think that I need elaborate the matter, having indicated, as I have already, the matters which were omitted. So far as the omission with regard to the living accommodation is concerned, it may well be said that that is implied in the fact of making the application at all, because the Act does only apply where the premises contain both shop and living accommodation if the living accommodation is used in accordance with section 10 (2).

Cases were cited to us with regard to the general county court jurisdiction. In Upton v. Farmer[5] Slesser L.J. gave a dissentient opinion in the Divisional Court, on the lines that an amendment ought not to be allowed where the original form was defective, in that it did not state the amount of damages claimed, and the county court jurisdiction depended upon the amount of damages claimed. In Legon v. Count,[6] the other judgment in Upton v. Farmer, that of Scrutton L.J., was approved, and it was laid down that "where proceedings are brought in the county "court for damages and the plaintiff fails to specify the amount "of damages, the county court judge has power to allow the "plaintiff to amend by restricting his claim for damages to an "amount within the jurisdiction of the court." I am not saying that in any event the principle which appealed to Slesser L.J. in the Upton case would have applied to an application under this Act. I refer to it because it was referred to in argument, but I think that Legon v. Count[6] disposes of that argument if it could ever have been maintained.

The nearest analogy to the present case is, I think, to be found in Hanily v. Minister of Local Government and Planning,[7] which was concerned with provisions in the Acquisition of Land (Authorization Procedure) Act, 1946. I can summarize the relevant provisions. They provide that a person aggrieved by a compulsory purchase order, who desired to question its validity, could, within six weeks, make application to the court. An application was made to the court within the six weeks, but after that period had elapsed and before the notice of motion came on for hearing, the applicant applied for leave to amend her notice of motion by adding a further and separate reason as ground for that conclusion. Cohen L.J., with whose judgment Singleton L.J. agreed, said[8]: "It seems to me, therefore, that there is "nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the Act, in applying "to the full the power which the court has under R. S. C., Order "28, r. 1, to allow an amendment, provided, of course, that "the original notice of motion clearly raised the point that the "authorization was not empowered to be granted under the Act."

Of course, the words there were different, and the subject-matter was different, but I have come to the conclusion that the original application here clearly raised the point that the applicant was applying for a new lease and was alleging that she was within the terms of the Act. Therefore, with respect, I reject the view which, I think, was taken by the county court judge, as indicated in his note, that this application was a nullity. I think that the view which I have formed is reinforced by the general nature and terms of the form. It contains in brackets indications of the matters which should be dealt with, rather than prescribing in a precise way the exact form that must be filed. Paragraph 7, which refers to the form, says: "The forms in the appendix "relating to proceedings under this Act shall be used in the cases "to which they are applicable with such variations, if any, as "may be required." Those words, I think, themselves indicate that the form is by way of guidance and by way of stating the type of matters which should be dealt with, rather than laying down the conditions precedent to a valid application.

That being so, the judge had, in my opinion, jurisdiction to consider, and should have considered, whether he should give leave to amend. In the written notes which were later submitted to him there are certainly one or two paragraphs which might be read as indicating that he did consider the matter from that aspect. They might be read as indicating that, considered from that aspect, he would not have allowed an amendment. I do not myself feel that it is satisfactory to treat the judge as having addressed his mind to the issue on that basis because, as appears from the note which he made at the time, he regarded himself as not having jurisdiction to do so.

I think, therefore, that it would be more satisfactory, and would probably save costs and time, if we addressed our minds in this court to the question whether, having regard to the circumstances, leave to amend ought to be given. I have come to the conclusion that leave to amend, subject to costs, ought to be given. I do not think that the details matter, but it was common ground that there had been negotiations for some time before the actual application was filed. The tenant had indicated that she would like a new lease at an increased rent, and I think that the landlord would have preferred to sell. There was an interview between the parties. The landlord would, on the fact of it, be familiar with the general nature of the premises of which he was the landlord. It was said that the failure to state the amount of the rent was a serious matter in that the landlord might be prepared to grant a lease for such a rent without incurring the costs of legal proceedings. It may be that that matter should be dealt with by an order as to costs but, in any event, although I do not think that the landlord was under a duty to make inquiries; he could, of course, have asked the applicant what rent she was prepared to pay, and the fact that he could so easily have done that makes it, I think, difficult for

1953
OSBORNE v. SNOOK.
Somervell L.J.

him to make much of that type of omission in considering whether leave to amend should be given. That the applicant should pay the costs was conceded, because she came to court with an application which was not in order and did not give the details as required by the rules and so had to seek leave to amend.

I would, myself, grant leave to amend within whatever time may be appropriate and have the matter remitted, so that it could be heard, subject to an order that the applicant should bear the costs of the proceedings. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

BIRKETT L.J. I am of the same opinion. The central point of the case, of course, was subsection (1) of section 11 of the Act of 1951. "An application under this part of this Act for the "grant of a new tenancy shall—(a) if apart from this section the "expiring tenancy would expire by effluxion of time, not be made "later than one month before the date on which that tenancy "would so expire; . . ." Why I call it the central point of the case is because, as I read the judgment of the county court judge, that was the dominant point in his mind at all times. The ground which he gave in his own note for the refusal of the application was, "Application for new tenancy refused on ground "that no application for tenancy complying with Act has been "filed." When he came to deal in some detail with the matter he referred to the authorities to which my Lord has referred, which asserted the principle for which Mr. Miller, the solicitor on behalf of the landlord, contended, and said: "These two "authorities"—Marshall's case [9] and Hanily's case [10]—do, I "think, clearly establish the principle for which Mr. Miller "contends. It is this: if you get a period limited by statute, or "rules, duly made, limitations within which the defendant or "respondent is entitled to be protected, then no amendment "should be allowed in proceedings depriving him of that "limitation."

The view which the judge took, I think, of the powers to amend were governed by the views he had taken of that principle, because he said a little later: "Whether, indeed, there is power "to amend it does not seem to me to be material. It would be "wrong to allow an amendment after practically one month has "elapsed. Mr. Miller's suggestion is right and I refuse leave to "amend, and I am bound to hold that the application is bad in "form as it does not comply with the rules. The result is that I "have no power to grant a new tenancy and the application "fails."

The original application in this case was made on August 28, 1952. The lease expired on September 29, and so the application was just within the month prescribed by section 11. My Lord has already expressed the view that this was a proper application, because it opens with these words: "Madeline Marie Osborne of "The Post Office, Upton, Poole in the county of Dorset, widow, "hereby applies to the court for the grant of a new tenancy "pursuant to the provisions of section 10 of the Leasehold "Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, as the occupier of "a shop under a tenancy to which that section applies. The "following are the particulars." Those particulars follow, in the main, the form 342A which is prescribed under the rules, namely, the address of the premises, the date of the lease, the names of the parties, the terms, the rent, the mode of termination. All those matters are set out. Oddly enough, the concluding matters in the form, as to the extent of the living accommodation, and things of that kind, are omitted.

OSBORNE v. SNOOK.

Birkett L.J.

The objection which was taken in the pleadings by the answer of the landlord was that: "The originating application does not "comply with the provision of the Leasehold Property (Tem- "porary Provisions) Act, 1951, or the rules thereunder." It is true that before the actual hearing by the county court judge an amendment had been made. That does not even now appear to be quite accurate or full. The judge took the view, after considering the matter with some care, that the question of amendment really did not arise because if it did there was no valid application before him. That must necessarily mean that he regarded the provisions of the rules, which had not, admittedly, been followed, as conditions precedent to the jurisdiction which he was to exercise. I share the view which my Lord has expressed, that that was a wrong view to take.

On the question of amendment, I would add this: under Order 15, r. 1 of the county court rules the directions with regard to amendment are set out: "The court may, at any time—(a) "amend any defects and errors in any proceedings whether the "defect or error is that of the party applying to amend or not; "and (b) add, strike out or substitute any person either as "plaintiff or defendant; and all such amendments as may be "necessary for the purpose of determining the real question in "controversy between the parties shall be made, if duly applied "for." In the note to that rule we had cited to us this passage: "An amendment should always be allowed if it can be made "without injustice to the other side, and there is no injustice if "the other side can be compensated by costs." Then there is a quotation from Bowen L.J.[11]: "I know of no kind of error or "mistake which, if not fraudulent or intended to overreach, a "court ought not to correct, if it can be done without injustice "to the other party, for the courts of justice do not exist for the "sake of discipline, but for the sake of deciding matters in "controversy, and amendments for this purpose ought not to be "regarded as matters of favour or of grace."

[11] (1884) 26 Ch.D. 700, 710.

The facts of this case, as we now know from the correspondence, which I understand was read to the county court judge, show that the negotiations, which continued for some time, were, in fact, opened by the landlord in June, 1952, when Messrs. Miller, acting for Mr. Snook, were suggesting that the property should be sold. The correspondence does not matter except to show that it was conducted on a very friendly and co-operative basis. For example, under the date of July 26, the solicitors for the applicant were writing: "Would your client "consider granting Miss Osborne a lease, perhaps at an increased "rent, to be negotiated, to run in reversion on the lease held by "the late Mrs. A. B. Harvey, which expires on September 29 "next? Our client would prefer to take up a new lease, if this "can be arranged, but if not she obviously will have to save the "position so far as she can by taking the steps open to her under "the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951. "This she is reluctant to do if a more friendly course is open to "her, and perhaps you will take an early opportunity of seeing "your client and letting us know his views." In truth, as the correspondence discloses, the applicant and Mr. Snook, the landlord, actually met and discussed this matter between them. The correspondence, which continued right down to the end of August, ends on the note that the landlord is saying, "I would "like to sell," and the applicant is saying, "I would like a "lease." In those circumstances, of course, the question whether an amendment should be allowed assumes great importance, but I cannot for myself think that there is any element of any kind in this action which suggests that there would be an injustice, or anything approaching an injustice, by allowing the amendment which is sought to be made in this case.

For these reasons, I agree with the decision which already has been announced by my Lord.

ROMER L.J. I also agree. The main argument presented to us on behalf of the landlord was that there was no effective application before the judge at all, because the application which was in fact put in failed to conform with the requirements of the County Court Rules, 1936, under Order 40A. There is no doubt that the application did fail to conform with those rules in certain respects, but that failure, as I think, cannot have the effect of invalidating the application to such a degree that it must be regarded as not being an application at all. If that were the true view of the matter then, even if the application had been made some months before the date on which the lease expired, similarly the county court judge would have had no power to give leave to amend and would have had to dismiss it out of hand. I think that that would be a most regrettable result, and I do not think that it is the result which emerges from a consideration of the Act and the rules. One only arrives at that result, as has already been pointed out, if the true view of the matter is that compliance

1953
OSBORNE v. SNOOK.
Romer L.J.

with the various requirements of the form in Order 40A amounts to a condition precedent which, unless performed, invalidates the application.

It is to be observed that in this form all kinds of things are provided for by way of particulars which should be given, many of them comparatively unimportant, many of them already known to the landlord. I cannot think that if the Rules Committee had intended that compliance with the form was to be treated as a condition precedent to an application they would have put into the form so many relatively unimportant matters of detail. It was admitted on behalf of the landlord that some of them were plainly unimportant, and it was said that if there was failure to comply with those that would not invalidate the application. On the other hand, it was argued that failure to comply with those which were of importance would invalidate the application. It seems to me that that is not a tenable way of approaching the matter, because either they are all of such importance as to invalidate the application if they are disregarded, or none of them are. The court can pick and choose between them. Although some of them are of importance, for reasons which my Lord has indicated, and such that the landlord should be acquainted with them as soon as possible, if they were intended to have the drastic effect which the argument for the landlord here would result in, I think that they would have been, in the first place, isolated from matters which were not important, and I think, also, that they would probably have appeared in the rules themselves and not been relegated to the form. Be that as it may, I agree with what my Lords have said, that they cannot have the treatment accorded to them which the landlord is contending for.

The landlord primarily relied on British and Colonial Furniture Co. Ld. v. William McIlroy Ld.,[12] but that seems to me to have been quite a different case. That was an application under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and the application there, by the very terms of the statute, could only be made if it was made in the prescribed manner. The application there was not made in the prescribed manner and, therefore, it was not an application of the kind which was required by the Act itself. Donovan J., with what reluctance I know not, said that he could not deal with it; it was not an application and, therefore, he could not entertain it and could not allow the amendment.

It was sought to say that this case was similar to McIlroy's case[12] by pointing to the word "duly" in section 12 of the Act of 1951. It was said that an application cannot be regarded as "duly" made under the Act unless it conforms to the form in the Order. I think that the word "duly" falls very far short of the words "in the prescribed manner" in the Act of 1927. I think that the word "duly" in section 12 is probably referable to the requirement in section 11 that the application was "not

Romer L.J.

" to be made later than one month before the date on which that " tenancy would so expire "; and it may possibly incorporate or envisage other matters as well. But it does not seem to me that there is any reason to suppose that it was incorporating as a requirement the due observance in point of form of any rules which might be made in accordance with the Act. It appears to me, therefore, that the case of McIlroy [12] does not assist the landlord in this case, nor does it drive this court to what is clearly a somewhat unfortunate result, which was the result in McIlroy's case,[12] of defeating without hope of amendment an application which, although plainly directed to a certain jurisdiction and invoking that jurisdiction, did not comply in matters of form with the direction laid down or prescribed by the Act. I am glad that we are able to allow this matter to proceed, because it is never very satisfactory if an application is defeated, and irremedially defeated, merely because of failure in point of form to comply with certain requirements.

I agree with the conclusions which my Lord has indicated.

*COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE v. PEARLBERG.

[1952 I. 2789.]

Revenue—Income tax—Land and buildings (Schedule A)—Failure to appeal to Commissioners—Liability to tax absolute—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), s. 169—Finance Act, 1941 (4 & 5 Geo. 6, c. 30), s. 12, *Sch. An appeal against an assessment to income tax in respect of property chargeable under Sch. A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, can only be made in the manner provided in the Income Tax Acts, to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of Income Tax, with an appeal from their decision to the High Court on points of law by case stated. Where there has been no appeal to the Commissioners within the statutory period the liability to pay the tax as assessed is absolute and cannot afterwards be challenged in proceedings in the High Court.

Decision of Havers J. affirmed.

1953

COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE v. PEARLBERG.

APPEAL from a judgment of Havers J.

From 1945 onwards the defendant, Harry Hyman Pearlberg, was notified of assessments made on him under rule 8 of No. VII of Sch. A of the Income Tax Act, 1918,[1] as the "landlord" of a number of small properties in the Manchester division. He did not appeal against those assessments within the period of 12 months allowed by paragraph 6 (3) of Sch. X of the Finance Act, 1942; nor did he pay the tax. As regards another group of properties, he was charged, under section 12 of the Finance Act, 1941, as being the landlord, a notice having been duly served on him under paragraph 1 of Sch. I to the Act of 1941. He did not appeal against that notice; nor did he pay the tax.

On May 22, 1952, the Inland Revenue Commissioners issued a writ claiming £438 7s. 0d. in respect of tax alleged to be due on the properties, and, then, for the first time, the defendant sought

[1] Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 169 (1): "Any tax charged under the provisions of this Act may be sued for and recovered, with full costs of suit, from the person charged therewith in the High Court as a debt due to the Crown, or by any other means whereby any debt of record or otherwise due to the Crown can, or may at any time, be sued for and recovered . . . ":

Sch. A, No. VII, r. 8: "The assessment and charge shall be made upon the landlord in respect of—

"(a) any dwelling-house in the occupation of a tenant which, with the buildings or offices belonging thereto, and the land occupied therewith, is of less annual value than ten pounds; and

"(b) any lands and tenements which are let for a period less than one year; and

"(c) any house or building let in different apartments or tenements, and occupied by two or more persons severally. . . .

"Provided that in each of the above cases in default of payment by the landlord, the tax may be levied upon the occupier or occupiers respectively."

Finance Act, 1941, s. 12 (1): "An assessment to income tax made under rule 8 of No. VII of Sch. A shall be valid as against all persons although not made on the person who should have been assessed and the tax under any assessment to income tax made under the said rule 8 may be recovered from the person who is the landlord of the land to which the assessment relates on the first day of January in the year of assessment for which the assessment was made."

Sch. 1, para. 1: "Legal proceedings shall not be instituted against a person as having been the landlord . . . (where he is not the person named in the assessment) until the expiration of 21 days from the service on him . . . of a notice in writing, . . . specifying the land and the amount of tax claimed and stating that it is intended to proceed against him for the recovery thereof as having been the landlord of that land on the first day of January in the year of assessment for which the assessment was made.

Para. 2: "Any person served with such a notice may appeal to the General Commissioners. . . ."

Para. 3: "Any such appeal . . . may be founded upon the contention that the appellant was not the landlord of the land on the said first day of January."

Para. 5: "Where no appeal is brought or is pending . . . it shall be conclusively presumed that the person on whom the notice was served was the landlord of the land on the said first day of January and that the amount of tax specified in the notice is due from him so far as it still remains unpaid; . . ."

Finance Act, 1942, Sch. 10, para. 6 (3): "The time within which notice of appeal may be given against any assessment under Schedule A or Schedule B shall, in the case of any person who has not been served with a notice of the assessment, be any time before the expiration of 12 months from the end of the year of assessment."

to contest the assessments and to adduce evidence in support of his defence that he was not chargeable to the tax. As regards the first group of properties, where the tax was chargeable on the landlord under rule 8 of No. VII of Sch. A, he said that he was not the "landlord," that he had never owned or been in receipt of the rents and profits from the properties, but that he was, and had been ever since November, 1943, an undischarged bankrupt. As regards the remainder of the properties, in respect of which he was charged under the Act of 1941, he denied that he had been at any time the owner, occupier or landlord of the properties.

Master Diamond ordered that the Commissioners be at liberty to sign final judgment against him for the amount indorsed on the writ, with interest, if any, and costs. Havers J. (sitting in chambers) confirmed that order.

The defendant appealed.

Cyril King Q.C. and Desmond Miller for the defendant.
Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

No cases were cited in argument.

DENNING L.J. stated the facts and continued: The issue which the defendant raises in his affidavits is that he is not rightly chargeable with tax, for one or other of the reasons he has mentioned. The whole question in the case is: is that an issue which he is allowed to have tried in these proceedings in the High Court? The correct answer has been, I think, given by Sir Reginald Hills, namely, that the right way for the defendant to have challenged any of these matters was by appeal to the Commissioners in the manner provided by the Income Tax Acts, and that, as he did not raise the matters by way of appeal, he is not allowed to raise them now. If we were to allow the defendant to raise these matters, it would mean that the High Court would become the tribunal to decide questions of fact and law on tax assessments, whereas they have been decided to the general satisfaction by the Commissioners for a great many years, with an appeal on points of law by case stated to the High Court. That is the proper remedy and not this. The provisions which exclude the defendant are these: so far as the first group of properties is concerned, once there is an assessment duly made, and not appealed from, then under section 169 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the tax charged may be sued for and recovered from the person charged therewith in the High Court as a debt due to the Crown; so far as the second group of properties is concerned, there is a conclusive presumption against him under the Act of 1941. In my opinion, therefore, all issues on the merits of these cases, as to fact or law, should have been determined by appeal to the Commissioners and cannot be raised at this stage. If there has been no appeal to the Commissioners the debts become absolute and conclusive, and their legal effect cannot be denied. The position was the same in the old days of the Latin Information. I, myself, remember that Rowlatt J. in these matters refused to go into the merits. He always said to the debtor: "You ought "to have appealed to the Commissioners." So now, although since the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, the procedure is different —by writ in the High Court—nevertheless, the assessment having been made, or the notice served, and no appeal made, the debt is absolute, and we have no alternative but to award judgment.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

Jan. 16.
Lord Goddard C.J., Croom-Johnson and Pearson JJ.

Practice and Procedure—Case stated by justices—Inclusion of relevant facts—Belated application for restatement of case.

ON an appeal by case stated by justices to the Divisional Court it appeared that a charge preferred against the respondent was dismissed by the justices on July 7, 1952. On September 22, 1952, an application was made to the justices by the appellant to state a case and the clerk to the justices asked the prosecution to do so. The case was duly stated, but was not sent to the respondent for approval, though a copy was received by him on September 30, 1952. On the case coming on for hearing, objection was taken for the respondent that relevant facts were omitted from the case as stated.

In the course of a judgment allowing the appeal, LORD GODDARD C.J. said: I do not think that there was any obligation on the clerk to the justices to submit the draft of the case to the respondent for revision, although it is done in many cases. If the justices see, from the case, that the facts are properly and fully stated according to their findings, I do not think that any further revision of the case is necessary. If, however, a respondent is of opinion that some of the facts as found by the justices—not merely some facts which have been submitted to them as evidence—have been omitted from the case as stated by them, it is open to him to make an application to a Divisional Court, supported by an affidavit setting out the findings of fact which in his opinion have been omitted, for a restatement of the case. In such circumstances the court will then consider whether the case should be sent back to the justices for restatement, if the facts alleged to have been found by them and to have been omitted from the case as originally stated had, in fact, been found by them. In the present case, a copy of the case has been in the possession of the respondent and his advisers since September 30, 1952, but there has been no application supported by an affidavit alleging that any facts found by the justices have not been stated in the case. The Divisional Court are concerned, not with the evidence given in the case, but with the facts which the justices found, and unless the court are satisfied that the justices found, or must have found, certain facts which they have omitted from the case, they will not send it back for amendment. Since the case has been in the hands of the respondent's advisers for all these months, the court cannot now send it back for amendment on a mere statement made on behalf of the respondent that certain facts have been omitted. It was the respondent's duty to act promptly in the matter.

The court then heard, and allowed, the appeal.

The Commissioners of Customs and Excise alleged that the stamps were chargeable with purchase tax on the ground that they were "pictures . . . of a kind produced in quantity for general "sale . . ." within the meaning of group 25 in the Eighth Schedule to the Finance Act, 1948:—

Stephenson Brothers Ld., plaintiffs in the first action, were manufacturers of furniture cream and floor polish. A substantial lump sum payment was made in consideration of the licence.

The licence so far as material recited: "Whereas (1) the "licensor by virtue of certain agreements between it and Walt "Disney productions an American corporation claims authority "to license within the territory hereinafter defined the use and "exploitation of the fanciful character or characters specified in "clause 1 of the schedule hereto as personified and represented "by Walt Disney for motion picture purposes (which character "or characters are hereinafter for convenience referred to as 'the "'fanciful character' and this collective description shall where "the context requires and admits be deemed to relate severally "to each fanciful character to which this licence relates) in "connexion with the manufacture and marketing of certain "classes of commodities and merchandise (2) The licensee "realizing the great value of the publicity and goodwill connected "with the fanciful character and the name 'Walt Disney' and "that it has established an identity for itself and for the products "bearing its name and/or design in the mind of the purchasing "public is desirous of obtaining authority within the territory "hereinafter defined to reproduce and/or associate the name of "the fanciful character together with the name 'Walt Disney' "and/or the name of the licensor in connexion with certain "merchandise of the licensee as hereinafter defined and the "licensor has agreed to permit such use upon the terms herein-"after contained." The operative part of the agreement provided: "the licensor authorizes the licensee to use and re-"produce the fanciful character and the name 'Walt Disney' "and/or the name of the licensor on upon and/or in connexion "with the sale of certain articles of merchandise as defined in ". . . the schedule hereto (which merchandise is hereinafter "for the purpose of this licence referred to as 'licensed articles') "and the licensor has or will supply to the licensee all necessary "typical representations of the fanciful character."

The expression "the fanciful character," was a collective description of characters from the Walt Disney motion picture production "Cinderella," the names of which were "Cinderella," "The Prince," "The King," "The Duke," "Fairy God-"mother," "Stepmother," "Drizella," "Anastasia," "Bruno," "Lucifer," "Gus," "Jaq" and "Lackey." The articles of merchandise referred to were "Furniture cream and floor polish "manufactured by the licensee affixed to which in a manner to "be approved by the licensor are printed representations of the "fanciful characters in four colour half tones in the form of "poster stamps of a size one and five-eighths inches deep by one "and three-sixteenths inches wide."

Clause 28 of the Schedule provided: "The licensee further "undertakes that premium material shall be supplied by the "licensee to purchasers of licensed articles in exchange for "licensed stamps in a manner to be approved by the licensor "and that such premium material shall consist exclusively of "a stereoscopic eye piece and a 'Magic Mirror Picture Book' "containing six scenes from the Disney film 'Cinderella' which "book shall be published and printed (by one of the licensees "of the licensor to be selected in agreement with the licensee "in a form and upon terms to be approved by the licensor) in "such manner that when viewed through a stereoscopic eye piece "such scenes will appear in stereoscopic relief."

Stephensons adopted three methods of obtaining the stamps.

The first was by an order in January, 1951, for the printing of 10,000,000 stamps by King & Jarrett Ld., the plaintiffs in the second action. King & Jarrett Ld. received this order through Barneys Ld., who acted as agents for Stephensons.

It was agreed that there was a sale of the 10,000,000 stamps by King & Jarrett Ld. to Barneys, and at that time, as between King & Jarrett Ld. and Barneys, they were nothing but pieces of paper containing pictorial representations.

A second order by Stephensons was made direct to King & Jarrett for 100,000 stamps, and in that order Barneys took no part. It was conceded that that transaction stood on the same footing as the first transaction.

The third method was that 500,000 stamps were printed by Stephenson Brothers themselves.

The stamps, apart from bearing pictorial figures described in the licence, bore a number prominently upon the face. The numbers ran from 1 to 12, and were less than half an inch high. On the back of each pictorial stamp was written: "'Wand' erful "book for you. Collect a set of these stamps numbered 1 to 12. "Send to Stephenson Brothers Ld., Bradford, with 1s. P.O. to "cover post and packing, any time before December 31, 1952, "for wonderful 'Magic Wand' Book, value 7s. 6d." This book was connected with the copyright characters which were the subject of the licence.

Folders, each containing a small number of the stamps, were attached to containers of floor polish and furniture cream by transparent tape. On the uppermost side of each folder was printed "Your Cinderella stamps are here." These goods were supplied by Stephensons to retailers who supplied them to the public generally.

The Commissioners of Customs and Excise notified Stephensons that purchase tax would be demanded on these poster stamps on the ground that they were "pictures" within the meaning of group 25 of the Eighth Schedule to the Finance Act, 1948.[1]

The plaintiffs in both actions asked for a declaration that the poster stamps were not goods chargeable with purchase tax.

ROXBURGH J. having stated the facts continued: There are two questions here. The first question in order of logic—the other question only concerns the transaction in which Stephenson Brothers Ld. printed their own poster stamps—is whether these poster stamps are goods at all. I was, perhaps, responsible for starting a point which, on consideration, I think is not well-founded. The definition of "goods" in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, is incorporated by section 41 (1) into the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940. The material part of the definition of "goods" in section 62 of the Sale of Goods Act is "'Goods' include all "chattels personal other than things in action." As production of a set of 12 of these documents in the manner directed on the back entitled a person to the book valued at 7s. 6d., it at one time seemed to me that these might be choses in action, but I do not think that, on further consideration, that is a possible view. First, it cannot be put higher than this, that each stamp contains an offer of a contract and not more. That cannot constitute either a contract in writing or a memorandum of a contract in writing, and therefore the stamps cannot in my judgment be regarded as choses in action.

Secondly, each one of the stamps is sold separately; it is conceded that these documents are sold and I do not have to determine that point. One of them per se is nothing at all except an offer of a contract. A further stage is not reached even if the offer is accepted until one has 12 in a set. It is not easy to achieve. Mathematicians in court have calculated the chances; in other words, how many boxes on the average it would be necessary to buy in order to get a set. I am unable to embark upon such abstruse calculations, but I am satisfied that it would have to be a good many, certainly more than 12. I do not think, therefore, that these are choses in action. That point could only have applied to the poster stamps which Stephensons themselves printed, because as between King & Jarrett Ld. and Stephenson

[1] The Finance Act, 1948, Eighth Sch., group 25: "Pictures, prints, "engravings, photographs, figures, "busts, reliefs, vases, and similar "articles, of a kind produced in quan-"tity for general sale. . . ." Subsequent amendments to group 25 did not alter those words.

Brothers Ld. or Barneys they were obviously nothing in the nature of choses in action; they were merely bits of paper with something printed upon them.

I will now consider the main, and much the most difficult, point in the case. Are these poster stamps pictures of a kind produced in quantity for general sale? One thing is clear, they are not exclusively pictures; they operate as something more. But I do not think that that is in any way fatal to the Crown's case. If there is a dual purpose article, as I read the Finance Act, 1948, it would not cease to be a picture because it was also sold for some other purpose. On the other hand, I am satisfied that not every pictorial representation on a document or other article is necessarily a picture within this definition. Therefore, it is a very nice and narrow question. First, the nature of the article has to be tested at the moment when it is delivered to the retailer. That is the moment at which the tax becomes exigible, and it must be then that liability to tax falls to be determined, and it has to be decided then whether the article falls into some, and if so which, group. It is also true to say, however, that one must look forward and consider the article not in relation to the middleman, but in the hands of the ultimate consumer. That, I think, is indicated by the words "for general "sale," which I construe as meaning "for sale to the public "generally."

Group 25 must be considered (and for this purpose I have reached the same conclusion whichever particular version of the group happens to be in force at the particular time), at the moment when the goods are being delivered to the retailer in order to ascertain what this thing is, and having decided what it is, one has to determine whether it is of a kind produced in quantity for sale to the public generally. In this case no difficulty arises on those latter words, because this kind of thing is very common and has been so for many years. It is not seriously contested before me that these articles, whatever they may be (and that is the real difficulty) are not of a kind produced in quantity for general sale. In fact, Stephenson Brothers Ld. alone produced or caused to be produced several million.

The real question is: What was the article at the date when it was delivered to the retailer, or what would it be—this being an action for a declaration, which to some extent covers future questions—at the moment when it is delivered to the retailer?

It is always dangerous to try and put glosses on the words of an Act of Parliament, and I shall not try to do so. It is enough to say that one has to look at the substance of the question. Each stamp is an article with various features, and I must consider as a whole what it is. The fact that it contains a pictorial representation is not, in my judgment, decisive; there still remains the question: Is it properly to be described as a picture?

Stephenson Bros. Ld. v. Commissioners of Customs and Excise. King & Jarrett Ld. v. Same.

Roxburgh J.

The two strong points in Mr. Clements' case are these: He said first that the numbers on the stamps were wholly disproportionate, and that if each document were to be regarded as a picture there were things plainly lacking in additional artistic attraction, which gave a clear indication that though there was a pictorial representation the article was not a picture. He argued further that the words on the back made it quite plain that it was a coupon. But, in my judgment, it is a pictorial coupon, and a pictorial coupon may be a picture or it may not. It must depend on the facts of each particular case. One could imagine a coupon which contained all the information printed on these stamps and, in addition, had some inferior pictorial representation of a lion or a cat or something printed on it. I am by no means sure that that would be a picture. It would be a pictorial coupon. That is what I mean by saying that each case must depend upon its own particular facts. But here the case is quite different. Walt Disney cartoons are universally known and beloved by many, and Stephenson Brothers Ld. have stated that they attach importance to these cartoons as cartoons. I refer to what is said about them in the recital to the licence. I do not for a moment suggest that this kind of question has to be determined upon evidence, and therefore that is not evidence against them, because evidence is not admissible on this matter; but I rely on it only to confirm my view that these are quite definitely dual purpose stamps, one of the purposes of which is to entertain by these cartoons.

That, of course, is the normal purpose of a cartoon, and normally a cartoon is a picture within group 25; thus so far they are for the normal purpose for which cartoons are reproduced, and so far they are, in my judgment, pictures. On the other hand, of course, they are plainly coupons. Therefore, in my view, they are pictorial coupons; but the pictorial element is so important in the particular circumstances of this case that they are, in my judgment, pictures, and none the less so because at the same time they are coupons.

Therefore both these actions must fail.

Building—"Scaffold"—Boards on roof for workman to stand on—Duty to provide—Warning notice—Fragile roof—Risk of falling on adjoining roof—Whether working "above" it—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1145), regs. 3, 5, 31 (3) (a) (b).

Damages—Personal injuries—Workman's life materially shortened—Damages not to include wages which, but for the accident, would have been earned during natural life.

The plaintiff, while working for the defendants on the drip edge of a flat roof fell on to an adjoining sloping roof, about two feet below, made of asbestos. The asbestos broke and he fell more than 10 feet to the ground and was seriously injured, his expectation of life being materially shortened. He claimed damages from the defendants, alleging that they were in breach of their common law duty to him to provide a safe system of working, and in breach of their statutory duty under regulations 5 and 31 (3) (a) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, to provide scaffold and other plant, and under regulation 31 (3) (b) to display warning notices:—

Held, first, that the risk of the plaintiff falling through the asbestos roof was one which the defendants could and should have reasonably foreseen, and that in failing to take such precautions as would guard him from falling they had failed in their duty to provide a safe system of working and were guilty of negligence at common law.

Held, secondly, that had boards been placed on the asbestos roof for the plaintiff to stand on to perform his work they would have constituted a "scaffold" within the definition in regulation 3 of the Building Regulations, and in failing to provide such boards for that purpose the defendants were in breach of regulation 5.

The defendants not having displayed any notice that the roof was fragile, were also in breach of regulation 31 (3) (b), but inasmuch as the plaintiff knew that it was fragile that breach had no bearing on the accident and his claim failed so far as that regulation was concerned. There was no breach of regulation 31 (3) (a) since the defendant was not working "above" the asbestos roof in the vertical sense.

Held, lastly, that in assessing damages no sum could be allowed in respect of loss of wages between the anticipated date of the plaintiff's death due to shortened expectation of life and the date to which he would normally have lived but for the accident. The statement of principle to the contrary in the headnote to Roach v. Yates [1938] 1 K.B. 256 ([1937] 3 All E.R. 442) was not borne out by the judgments in that case.

HARRIS v. BRIGHTS ASPHALT CONTRACTORS LD.

ACTION.

On November 24, 1950, the plaintiff, an asphalt spreader, employed by the defendants, was chipping old asphalt from the vertical drip edge, about eight-and-a-half inches wide, of a flat roof, 13 to 15 feet above the ground, preparatory to replacing it with new asphalt. He was kneeling about 9 inches from the edge. He either overbalanced or slipped whilst changing his position and fell on to an adjoining sloping roof about two feet below, which rose at an angle of about 30 degrees to a central ridge and was covered with asbestos. That roof broke and the plaintiff fell through it more than 10 feet on to the floor below and sustained serious injuries. The Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, were admittedly applicable to the work the plaintiff was doing.

The method of working adopted by the plaintiff was the normal one for such work, but it could have been performed by standing on boards placed on the sloping roof. The plaintiff was aware that the roof below him was fragile, but he did not ask for planks to be placed upon it or for anything to catch him in case he fell. The defendants' foreman was aware of the nature of the asbestos roof, but no safety devices were provided, nor were there any notices stating that the roof was fragile.

At the time of the accident the plaintiff was 35 years of age, and had always enjoyed good health. As a result of the accident his spine was fractured and, among other things, the lower portion of his body became paralysed, and his expectation of life was materially reduced, medical reports estimating it at between six months and two years from the date of the trial of the action (between two-and-a-half to four years from the date of the accident). Since the accident all his time had been spent in hospital and he had undergone two operations; he had suffered, and would continue to suffer, great pain and discomfort, and he would require nursing and attention for the remainder of his life.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants, alleging that his injuries were caused by their failure to comply with the provisions of regulation 31 (3) (a) and (b),[1] or, alternatively, of regulation 5[2] of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948. He further alleged that the defendants were guilty of negligence at common law in that, inter alia, they negligently adopted an unsafe system of working.

The defendants denied breach of statutory duty and negligence, and alleged that the plaintiff's injuries were solely caused, or contributed to, by his own negligence.

For the plaintiff the point was taken, on the authority of Roach v. Yates,[3] that the damages to which he was entitled included damages in respect of loss of the wages which he would have earned during his natural life had it not been shortened by the accident.

SLADE J. stated the facts and continued: The breaches of common law duty alleged, with one exception, are substantially a repetition of the breaches of regulations 5 and 31 (3) (a) and (b) of the Building Regulations. The important exception is the allegation of failure to provide a safe system of working. The first question is: What is the duty which an employer owes to his servant? Mr. Beney referred me to *Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co. HARRIS v. BRIGHTS ASPHALT CONTRACTORS LD.

Slade J.

" the contract between employer and employed involves on the " part of the former the duty of taking reasonable care to provide " proper appliances, and to maintain them in a proper condition, " and so to carry on his operations as not to subject those " employed by him to unnecessary risk." In case there is any doubt about the meaning of " unnecessary," I would also take the duty as being a duty not to subject the employee to any risk which the employer can reasonably foresee, or, to put it slightly lower, not to subject the employee to any risk that the employer can reasonably foresee and which he can guard against by any measures, the convenience and expense of which are not entirely disproportionate to the risk involved. I am prepared to approach this case upon whichever of those possible definitions imposes the lowest duty upon the defendants. I also bear in mind Lord Wright's remarks in Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co. Ld. v. English[4]: " The same principle, in my opinion, applies to those funda- " mental obligations of a contract of employment which lie " outside the doctrine of common employment, and for the " performance of which employers are absolutely responsible. " . . . The obligation is fulfilled by the exercise of due care and " skill."

[His Lordship considered the evidence and continued:] I find as a fact that the accident which happened to the plaintiff was one which his employers could reasonably have foreseen; that the risk was one which could and should reasonably have been foreseen, and that the accident was unnecessary in the sense that it could have been prevented or guarded against by the simplest possible measures. It could have been guarded against simply by the use of three or four 9-inch-wide boards placed on the sloping roof. That would have operated as a safeguard in two ways: firstly, against the risk of overbalancing, in that had the plaintiff fallen on to such boards he would have fallen a distance of a maximum of some 2 feet, and, secondly, he could have performed the work in complete safety by standing on the planks. True, that would have meant standing at an angle of 30 degrees, but I cannot imagine that there would be any very great difficulty in working with a hammer and chisel in that position for the comparatively short time required to chip off the asphalt from the drip edge. In my judgment, it is almost impossible to contend that there was not a risk in kneeling only 9 inches from an edge with a fall of 13 feet to 15 feet.

In the result, therefore, I find that the defendants were in breach of their common law duty to the plaintiff, and it becomes, strictly speaking, unnecessary for me to decide the question of breach of statutory duty, but in case the matter goes further, I will express my view.

A breach of regulation 5 of the Building Regulations (as to the provision of scaffolds) is first alleged. Regulation 3 defines

"scaffold" as including, amongst other things, "any working "platform," and as meaning "any temporary structure on or from "which persons perform work." I interpret that to mean that if the three or four boards which I have mentioned were placed on the sloping roof to catch a man who overbalanced from above they would not constitute a scaffold, but if they were used for the purpose of standing on to do the work from, they would constitute a scaffold within the meaning of the definition. I hold, therefore, that regulation 5 requires the use in the present case of such planks for the purpose of their being used to do the work from. I find that there was a breach of the statutory duty imposed by regulation 5 in that had such boards been provided the plaintiff could have done the work from their security in complete safety.

The other two breaches alleged are both breaches of regulation 31 (3). Regulation 4 provides that it shall be the duty of every contractor and employer of workmen to whom the regulations apply to comply with regulation 5 and, inter alia, with such requirements of regulation 31 "as relate to any work, act or "operation performed or about to be performed by such "contractor or employer of workmen." Regulation 31 (3) states: "Where work is being done on or near roofs . . . covered "with fragile materials through which a person is liable to "fall a distance of more than 10 feet"—which was the case here —"(a) where workmen have to pass over or work above such "fragile materials, suitable and sufficient ladders, duck ladders "or crawling boards, which shall be securely supported, shall be "provided and used." If this regulation is to apply it must be because the plaintiff had to work "above" the fragile roof. What does "above" mean? Does it mean above in the vertical plane of the fragile roof, or does it mean above merely in the sense of at a greater height? I think that it means the former. In my view, therefore, "working above" means working over in the sense of higher in the vertical sense than the fragile roof. I hold that regulation 31 (3) (a) is inapplicable, and it follows that the defendants committed no breach of it.

Regulation 31 (3) (b) provides: "Prominent notices stating "that the coverings are fragile shall be affixed at the approaches "thereto." It is not necessary for me to decide precisely what the words "approaches thereto" mean. I should have thought that they applied to work being done on or near roofs, because "approaches" can only mean somewhere where, if a notice were affixed, it would give a warning to a person who was about to work on or near the roof. I am satisfied here that there was a breach of this regulation in that no notice, prominent or otherwise, stating that the coverings were fragile had been affixed anywhere at all. The claim fails, however, so far as there was a breach of that regulation, because that breach had no bearing on, and was not a cause of, the accident. The plaintiff knew at the material time that the roof was fragile and, therefore, it would have been a work of supererogation to have acquainted him by means of notices of that which he already knew.

I turn now to the defence of sole and contributory negligence. In Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries Ld.[5] Lord Wright said[6]: "What is all-important is to adapt the standard "of what is negligence to the facts, and to give due regard to "the actual conditions under which men work in a factory or "mine, to the long hours and the fatigue, to the slackening of "attention which naturally comes from constant repetition of "the same operation"—these are the words that I emphasize— "to the noise and confusion in which the man works, to his pre- "occupation in what he is actually doing at the cost perhaps of "some inattention to his own safety. . . . The policy of the "statutory protection would be nullified if a workman were held "debarred from recovering because he was guilty of some care- "lessness or inattention to his own safety, which though trivial "in itself threw him into the danger consequent on the breach "by his employer of the statutory duty." In that case there had been a breach of statutory duty, but I think that what is there said is equally applicable to breach of a common law duty to provide a safe system of working. I can see no distinction in principle.

Of course, I appreciate that it might be said that, as I have found against the defendants on negligence and breach of duty, I ought to accept and apply the same standards to the plaintiff in considering whether he was also guilty of negligence. I do not think that a court ought to be too astute to find a workman guilty of negligence, either as the sole or contributory cause of the accident, when he does not demur from a risk which the employer has imposed upon him, ex hypothesi, by a breach of common law duty or a breach of statutory duty. I am satisfied that the risk which the plaintiff ran was one which employee after employee knowingly, not voluntarily but knowingly, runs; in other words, a risk which is imposed on him by the system of working which is adopted by his employers and to which he does not demur. I am fully alive to the fact that an employee is also under a duty to his employer to take reasonable precautions for his own safety; but I do say that when the failure to do so consists of not demurring against a risk which his employers have imposed on him, the court ought not to be astute in finding contributory negligence. Using the best judgment which I can on the facts and the evidence in this case, I find as a fact that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

In the result, therefore, I find that this action succeeds.

That brings me to the question of damages, which I regard as the most difficult matter in this case. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was 35 years of age; he is now 37, and his expectation of life is a maximum of two years. Mr. Crichton said: "In dealing with the general damages you will have to "deal with the loss of earnings for the period between this man's "death"—at the latest, I am told, at the age of 39—"and the age "to which he would have lived if he had not sustained the "accident." I have no evidence before me, but I should take judicial notice, if necessary, that apart from all the hazards of life a man in A.1 physical health would normally live to an age of at least 60. That means that Mr. Crichton invited me to award as part of the general damages some sum to represent the loss of earnings for 21 years during which the plaintiff would no longer be alive. When I expressed some little surprise, Mr. Crichton referred me to the headnote in Roach v. Yates,[7] a decision of the Court of Appeal, which is, of course, binding upon me. If I thought that the headnote was supported by the judgments, I should unhesitatingly follow it.

The headnote reads: "In a collision between a pedal bicycle "ridden by the plaintiff, a bricklayer, 33 years of age, and a car "driven by the defendant, occasioned by the negligence of the "latter, the plaintiff sustained serious injury to the brain render- "ing him permanently, not only unfit for work, but incapable "of looking after himself and dependent both day and night upon "the care of a nurse, and shortening his expectation of life from "30 to 16 years. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was "earning an average wage of £3 10s. a week. The plaintiff "having brought an action against the defendant for damages "for personal injury, it was agreed between the parties "that the plaintiff's pecuniary losses and expenses by reason of "the accident down to the date of the action amounted to £542, "and in respect thereof and of all his other damages past and "prospective the trial judge awarded him the sum of £2,742 in "all." Subtracting the special damages, the general damages awarded by the trial judge were precisely £2,200. "The plaintiff, "being dissatisfied with that sum, appealed: Held, by the Court "of Appeal, that in assessing the amount due to the plaintiff a "proper, though not necessarily the only, method to adopt"—I emphasize the word "proper"—"was to allow him (i) in respect "of his pecuniary losses and expenses down to the date of the "action the said agreed sum of £542; (ii) in respect of his prospec- "tive loss of wages the sum which he would have earned during "what, but for the accident, would have been his normal life "according to actuarial tables, subject to deductions for all con- "tingencies, that sum to be not less than £2,000."

I emphasize those words "the sum which he would have "earned during what, but for the accident, would have been his "normal life." His normal life should have lasted for another 30 years; in fact, of those 30 years he was going to be alive for 16 and dead for 14 if the prognostications of the doctors proved correct. According to the headnote, therefore, the Court of Appeal laid down that the damages must be based not only upon 16 years' loss of wages during actual life but also upon loss of wages for the further 14 years that he would not be alive. The headnote continues: "(iii) in respect of nursing attendance, a sum "sufficient to cover a reasonable weekly payment for that purpose "during the period of his life as shortened by the accident, that "sum being estimated at upwards of £2,000; and (iv) in respect of "his past and future physical and mental pain and suffering, and "the shortening of his life," a further sum, "in estimating which "the following considerations should be kept in view."

Of those four heads of damages, (i) is the special damage, and no question arises on that; but (ii) seems to me to be wholly unsupported by the judgments. In the judgment of Greer L.J. I can see no reference at all to assessing the value of imaginary earnings after the death of the injured party. There was no separate judgment on the part of Mackinnon L.J., but there are dicta in the judgment of Slesser L.J. which do lend support to the proposition stated in (ii) of the headnote. I am satisfied, however, that they are merely dicta. Greer L.J., at the end of his judgment, said[8]: "My learned brothers and I "have to decide what sum in all shall be awarded in this case "as damages to this unfortunate man, and we have come to the "figure of £6,542. That is the sum which, independently, each "member of this court thinks is a proper sum to award in this "case." I read that to mean not that each of the three judges had by a coincidence arrived at the figure of £6,000, but that they had thought that it was the sum which ought to be substituted for the £2,000 found by the trial judge; and that he (Greer L.J.) had arrived at that sum without any reference to the imaginary earnings after death.

I think that Slesser L.J. was saying no more than that he agreed that that was the proper sum, and that it could not be said to be improper, so to speak, particularly bearing in mind the loss of earnings after death, and that that was an element to be taken into consideration derived support from the decision in Phillips v. London & South-Western Railway Co.[9] Moreover, so far as it is possible to glean from the arithmetic in Roach v. Yates,[10] I cannot think that the figure of £6,000 could have been arrived at by taking into consideration the imaginary earnings of the plaintiff for the 14 years during which he ought to have been alive but would be prevented from being alive by the accident. His wages were £182 a year, and his normal expectation of life was 30 years; as a result of the accident, of those 30 years he was going to be alive for only 16 and dead for 14. As I understand it, it would be indisputable that he would be entitled to general damages for the loss of earnings from the date of judgment for the ensuing 16 years, but in computing that all the hazards of life, apart from the accident, would have to be taken into consideration. So far as I can see from the arithmetic, item (ii) was taken as being £2,000. Loss of wages for the 16 years of life at £182 a year would be somewhere between £2,900 and £3,000, and might very properly be discounted to a figure of £2,000; if another 14 years' loss of wages was also taken into consideration the figure would be 30 times £182, discounted for the whole of that period. The £2,000 seems, in my judgment, to be more aptly awarded upon the footing that the remaining 14 years were excluded. At any rate, it is sufficient for me to say that I am unable to find from the judgments in Roach v. Yates [10] that the Court of Appeal in fact decided any such thing as is ascribed to them in paragraph (ii) of the headnote, and I accordingly consider that the matter is res integra.

Phillips v. London and South-Western Railway Co.,[11] referred to by Slesser L.J., a claim by a doctor who was injured in a railway accident, was tried with a special jury before Field J. In summing up he referred to the prospect of the plaintiff's speedy death. The plaintiff was proved to have been earning between £6,000 and £7,000 a year and the jury assessed the damages at £7,000. The plaintiff appealed to the Queen's Bench Division on the ground that the verdict of £7,000 damages was grossly inadequate; it was, indeed, about the amount of one year's earnings. The Queen's Bench Division ordered a new trial and the defendants appealed from that order to the Court of Appeal. The defendants argued in the Court of Appeal that no misdirection had been found by the Queen's Bench Division, and that an appellate court ought not to interfere with the jury's verdict in the absence of misdirection. The Court of Appeal held that the Queen's Bench were right in ordering a new trial, and they did so, as I understand the decision, not on the basis that there had been any misdirection, but on the basis that the assessment was so grossly inadequate as to lead to the inference that it was an entirely erroneous estimate of damages.

James L.J. did use some expressions which are capable of being construed as referring to damages being allowable for losses after death and during the period the injured party would have lived but for the accident; but after quoting from the summing-up by Field J., he said [12]: "The case could not have been put more "favourably for the plaintiff than it was thus put by Field J." I think that he was merely saying that so far as misdirection had been alleged, there was nothing in that allegation because it could not have been put more favourably for the plaintiff, and that the ground on which the order of the Queen's Bench Division for a new trial was upheld was that, to award only the equivalent of one year's salary, without including the salary for whatever period the plaintiff would live, and to quantify the damages, including all his pain and suffering—which were of a terrible description.

HARRIS v. BRIGHTS ASPHALT CONTRACTORS LD.

Slade J.

I think that he was made virtually insane—at the sum of £7,000 was so inadequate, that the jury must have omitted to take into consideration matters which they ought to have taken into consideration.

I am unable to find anything in that case laying down the principle that a plaintiff in circumstances like the present is entitled to have taken into consideration the fact that he is prevented from earning wages over the period between the date of his death and the date to which he would normally have lived but for the accident. I therefore award no general damages on that basis, because I do not think that I am entitled to take them into consideration. Nothing can lengthen the plaintiff's life by the period by which it has been shortened as a result of the accident—restitutio in that sense is impossible—and I cannot think it right that I should give damages for loss of earnings for a period during which ex hypothesi he is not alive to earn them; if I were to give them I would not know upon what possible basis to assess them. The plaintiff might normally have been expected to live for 21 years longer than he is now likely to live. If I were to take his wages at £494 a year, and as remaining the same, and to multiply £494 a year by 21, discount that by a large amount because the capital sum would then be prematurely in his hands, and discount it by all the other hazards of life and arrive at a purely hypothetical figure of, say, £5,000, as a dead man has not got himself to keep and a dead man cannot spend money, I would be giving him that sum on the footing that he was alive and able to earn the salary when in fact he would be dead, and would not be able to spend it.

This point was present to the mind of Lord Atkin in Rose v. Ford,[13] when he said[14]: "Can the damages include a calculation "of loss of income which the deceased would have received "during normal expectation of life but would not have saved so "as to increase his estate? I express no opinion." Rose v. Ford[15] was not a case in which the plaintiff was still alive, but was a claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts, and I am fully alive to the provisions of section 1 (2) (c) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act of 1934, which provides that where the death of a person has been caused by the act or omission which gives rise to the cause of action, the damages shall be calculated without reference to any loss or gain to his estate consequent on his death. But it is at least strange, if the argument submitted to me based on Roach v. Yates[16] is correct, that no one has yet thought it necessary to argue in a death case that damages in respect of the loss of a life interest, the cesser of an annuity, or funeral expenses, are not damages which arise consequent on death, but are something which accrued to the injured party, as it has been suggested in this case, and pass to the plaintiff in an action commenced after the death of the injured party under this Act.

In my judgment, therefore, the only relevance of earnings which would have been earned after death is that they are an item of damages for loss of expectation of life, in the sense that they are one of the minor elements which indicate that a person earning a reasonable livelihood is more likely to have an enjoyable life. Save, therefore, in so far as I have just indicated, I exclude from the general damages any sum for loss of wages between the date of death and the date of the plaintiff's normal expectation of life apart from the accident.

I now have to quantify the damages that I ought to award under the head of prospective loss of wages, limiting that to the actual duration of life. I fix the plaintiff's expectation of life at 18 months; and the quantification becomes simple subject to the allowance which I have to make under the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948. His wages at the time of the accident were £8 3s. 7d. a week, and they are now £9 10s. 1d. a week. The time is so short that I can eliminate any contingencies such as that the plaintiff might die before the expiration of that period. I therefore take a year and a half, 78 weeks, at £9 10s. 1d. a week—that is £741 6s. 6d., and accordingly the sum I award under that head will be that sum less an amount [£224 4s. 6d.] as representing the appropriate allowance for the period of 18 months under the Act of 1948 which, of course, will be within the period of five years mentioned in section 1.

I now come to the question of nursing attendance. Mr. Crichton referred me to section 2 (4) of the Act of 1948 which provides "In "an action for damages for personal injuries (including any such "action arising out of a contract), there shall be disregarded, in "determining the reasonableness of any expenses, the possibility "of avoiding those expenses or part of them by taking advantage "of facilities available under the National Health Service Act, "1946." I think that all that that means is that, when an injured plaintiff in fact incurs expenses which are reasonable, that expenditure is not to be impeached on the ground that, if he had taken advantage of the facilities available under the National Health Service Act, 1946, those reasonable expenses might have been avoided. I do not understand section 2 (4) to provide the quite revolutionary alteration that a plaintiff shall be deemed to be entitled to recover expenses which in fact he will never incur. The plaintiff has been in one hospital or another from November 24, 1950, until today, and no claim of any kind is made for special damage in respect of past nursing and attendance. I consider it in the highest degree unlikely that there will be any change in that most desirable position between now and 18 months hence, but as nursing attendance is clearly a justifiable expense if it is incurred, I must have regard not to the probability, but to the possibility that some expense may be incurred under that head during the ensuing 18 months. I think that the possibility is so remote that this head of claim will be adequately met by an award of the sum of £25.

HARRIS v. BRIGHTS ASPHALT CONTRACTORS LD.

Slade J.

I now come to the last head of damages, for past and future physical and mental pain and suffering and the shortening or loss of expectation of life. I think that so far as it is humanly possible to assess damages for loss of expectation of life upon any basis whatever, the proper figure to take in the case of this particular plaintiff, who had an A.1 prospect of life and was 35 years of age at the time of the accident, bearing in mind the fact that he would have continued to receive wages sufficiently adequate not to cause him to live in penury, is £500.

The most serious item of all is the past and future physical and mental pain and suffering. [His Lordship reviewed the medical reports and continued:] I have to award a sum for the terrible physical and mental suffering, and I assess that sum at £5,000. The agreed special damage is £747 4s.

The damages I award to the plaintiff are, therefore, £6,789 6s. 0d.

[1951 H. 4163.]

Mortgage—Attornment clause—Default—Claim by mortgagee for possession—Requirement of notice—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5 (a), note.

An attornment clause in a mortgage contained a provision that, if the borrower was in default, the mortgagee might determine the tenancy after giving to the mortgagor at least seven days' notice in writing of his intention to do so:—

Held, that the mortgagee was not entitled to re-enter until seven days' notice had been given to the mortgagor.

The note in the Annual Practice under the heading "Possession" in the notes to R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5 (a) (see Ann.Pr. [1952] p. 1128), applies only to forms of attornment clause containing a provision dispensing with notice to determine the tenancy, when the security had become enforceable.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

By a legal charge dated May 17, 1947, and made between Ronald Henny (the mortgagor) and the Hinckley and Country

Building Society, by which certain premises were mortgaged by him to the society to secure payment of a sum of £950, it was provided (by clause 9): "The borrower hereby attorns tenant to "the society of such part of the property hereby charged as may "at any time be in his occupation at the yearly rent of sixpence "if demanded. (2) Provided that the society may at any time "after such default has been made as set out in section 4 hereof "by giving to the borrower or leaving upon the property at least "seven days' notice in writing of the intention of the society so "to do determine the tenancy hereby created and enter upon the "property but so that the said tenancy shall not render the "society liable to account to any person as mortgagees in "possession."

Default having been made by the mortgagor, this application was made to the court to determine whether the society was entitled to re-enter on the property without giving the seven days' notice provided by clause 9 of the mortgage.

J. A. Plowman for the applicants.

The defendant mortgagor did not appear.

The cases referred to in the argument are set out in the judgment.

UPJOHN J. This is a summons by the Hinckley and Country Building Society against Ronald Henny for an order for possession of certain premises which have been mortgaged by the defendant to the plaintiff building society. The mortgage was to secure payment of a sum of £950, which was to be repaid by certain weekly instalments. The mortgage provided that, if default should be made by the mortgagor for 13 weeks, the mortgage should become enforceable.

Clause 9 of the mortgage was in these terms: [His Lordship read clause 9 and continued:] In this case default has been made by the borrower and there is no doubt that on giving seven days' notice in writing to him the society would be entitled to determine the tenancy and to re-enter on the property. The sole question which I have to determine is whether the society is entitled to re-enter without giving the seven days' notice provided by clause 9.

The position of a mortgagor and a mortgagee where there is an attornment clause is well set out in a judgment of Lord Chelmsford in Jolly v. Arbuthnot.[1] He said: "A mortgagor "who remains in possession after the execution of a mortgage, "and continues to enjoy the profits of the land, is not con-"sidered as a tenant from year to year to the mortgagee, nor "even as a tenant at will; he receives the profits for his own "use, and not as agent or bailiff of the mortgagee, and when he "has once received them he is absolutely entitled to keep them "as his own: per Alderson B., Trent v. Hunt.[2] But he may

HINCKLEY AND COUNTRY BUILDING SOCIETY v. HENNY.

UPJOHN J.

" at any time be treated as a trespasser by the mortgagee, who " may maintain ejectment against him without any previous " notice or demand of possession. Such being the precarious " dependence of a mortgagor upon the will of the mortgagee, it is " competent to them to enter into an agreement by which the " mortgagor's possession may be rendered more secure by the " creation of a tenancy. This is sometimes effected by a " stipulation in the mortgage deed itself."

The attornment clause, therefore, is designed to give a greater measure of protection to the mortgagor. It may also be designed to give additional advantages to the mortgagee; that is to say, if a substantial rent is reserved by the attornment clause, it may be possible (and before the various Acts dealing with bills of sale it certainly was possible) for a mortgagee to distrain on the mortgage property to secure payment of his rent. That is clear from the observations of Bramwell L.J. in In re Stockton Iron Furnace Company[3]; see also the observations of Clauson J. in Woolwich Equitable Building Society v. Preston.[4] It is perfectly clear, therefore, that an attornment clause in a mortgage is valid and effectual, and in order to regain or resume possession a mortgagee must give notice in accordance with the provisions of the tenancy.

The claim by the plaintiff society that they are not bound to give such notice appears to be founded on a note in the Annual Practice under the heading " Possession " in the notes to Ord. 55, r. 5 (a). The note (Ann.Pr., 1952 ed., p. 1128) reads: " In proceedings claiming possession, as soon as the summons is " issued, the applicant is deemed to have re-entered and the " tenancy, year by year, as in the attornment clause, becomes " a tenancy at will, and as soon as the summons is served, the " tenancy at will is determined by the claim for possession. " Therefore it is not necessary for the applicants to prove they " had given a notice to quit determining the tenancy from year " to year," and the Woolwich Equitable Building Society case,[5] which I have already mentioned, is relied on as authority for that note.

But when that case is examined, it is quite clear that the attornment clause was in a form which is frequently found; that is, that after the power of sale has arisen, the tenancy can be determined without any previous notice to quit. Of course, in such circumstances, that provision is valid and effectual and it enables the mortgagee to re-enter without giving any notice. That decision really amounts to this, that the issue of a summons claiming possession was in fact a re-entry so that the tenancy became a tenancy at will; but that decision applies only, in my judgment, to cases where there is such a provision dispensing with notice to determine the tenancy when the security has become enforceable.

In this case there is no such provision, and it is quite clear upon the clause that, even after the borrower has made default, the society must give seven days' notice in writing to determine the tenancy. Until they do that, the borrower remains in possession as tenant and, therefore, as in this case there has been no such notice, the claim for possession fails, and I must dismiss the summons.

By section 112 of the Exeter Corporation Act, 1935, it was provided that surplus revenue of their electricity undertaking should in certain events be credited "to the revenue account of the undertaking for the next following year." By section 108 all money received by the corporation was to form part of the general rate fund. By virtue of the Electricity Act, 1947, the property of the Exeter Corporation, as electrical undertakers, vested in the British Electricity Authority as new statutory authorities, on April 1, 1948.

At the end of the financial year, 1947, the corporation applied a sum of £33,355, representing surplus revenue in respect of its electrical undertaking, in aid of local rates:—

Held, that on the true construction of section 112, that sum ought to have been carried over as revenue for the year 1948 in addition to the sum which had been transferred to the credit of the revenue account, and that, notwithstanding the provisions of section 108, there must be an order for payment of the sum of £33,355 by the corporation to the authority.

ACTION.

By virtue of sections 14 and 15 of the Electricity Act, 1947, the electricity undertaking of the Exeter corporation vested on April 1, 1948, in part in the British Electricity Authority, and as to the remainder in the South-Western Electricity Board (the two plaintiffs in this action). From April 1, 1935, until March 31, 1948, the corporation was, in regard to the disposal of the surplus revenue of their electricity undertaking, subject to the provisions contained in section 112 of the Exeter Corporation Act, 1935.[1]

In the financial year ending March 31, 1947, the corporation, purporting to act under the provisions of the local Act, transferred a profit balance (stated to be "Balance of contributions "1926/27—1942/43. Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926 (Fifth "Schedule) as amended by Exeter Corporation Act, 1935, "section 112.") from the electricity account to the general rate fund. At that date the reserve fund of the electricity undertaking exceeded the one-twentieth referred to in the section.

The plaintiffs were of opinion that this transfer was improper and unauthorized by the section, and that the sum in question should have been allowed to remain in the electricity account to enure for their benefit when the electricity undertaking vested in them.

The plaintiffs accordingly brought this action against the corporation, claiming a declaration that, in determining the amount of the assets held by the corporation immediately before April 1, 1948, there should be included therein the said sum of

[1] Exeter Corporation Act, 1935, s. 112 (1): "In lieu of the provisions "of subsection (1) of section 7 of the "Schedule to the Electric Lighting "(Clauses) Act, 1899 and of the "amendments to that subsection set "out in the Fifth Schedule to the "Electricity (Supply) Act 1926 the "following provisions shall apply with "respect to the electricity under-"taking' (in addition to the provisions "of the section of this Act of which "the marginal note is 'application "'of revenue of undertakings') "(namely):—

"If in any year the moneys received "by the corporation on account of the "revenue of the undertaking (includ-"ing the interest and annual proceeds "received by the corporation in that "year on the investments represent-"ing or forming part of any such "fund as is referred to in para-"graph (b) of subsection (1) of the "section of this Act of which the "marginal note is 'Receipts and ex-"'penses and as is provided in "connexion with the undertaking) "shall exceed the aggregate of the "moneys paid or expended by the "Corporation in respect of the under-"taking for the several purposes "mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (f) "of subsection (1) of the section of "this Act of which the marginal note "is 'Accounts' then—

"(a) If the reserve fund in respect "of the undertaking does not amount "to more than one-twentieth of the "aggregate capital expenditure for "the time being on the undertaking "a sum equal to the amount of such "excess shall be credited to the "revenue account of the undertaking "for the next following year and the "charges for electricity supplied by "the corporation shall be reduced by "such amount or respective amounts "as will as nearly as reasonably "practicable be equivalent in the "aggregate to the said excess;

"(b) if the said reserve fund "amounts to more than one-twentieth "of the said aggregate capital expen-"diture such amount as the corpora-"tion may think fit (not being less "in cases where the said excess of "receipts over expenses is more than "a sum equal to one and a half "per centum of the outstanding "debt of the undertaking than the "difference between the said excess "and that sum) shall be credited to "the revenue account of the under-"taking for the next following year "and the charges for electricity "supplied by the corporation shall be "reduced by such amount or respec-"tive amounts as will as nearly as "reasonably practicable be equiva-"lent in the aggregate to the amount "so deemed to be revenue."

£33,355, being the amount transferred to the general rate fund unlawfully and contrary to the statutory enactments relating to the electricity undertaking transferred by the corporation; and a declaration that in so far as the corporation had unlawfully done any act, in consequence of which the revenue of their electricity undertaking or the assets to be transferred to the plaintiffs on April 1, 1948, were less than they otherwise would have been, the corporation were liable to pay the amount of such deficiency either by way of damages or otherwise to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs claimed also certain further sums of a minor nature.

Harold I. Willis Q.C. and H. F. J. Teague for the plaintiffs.

Sir Andrew Clark Q.C. and Denys Buckley for the defendant corporation.

The following cases were cited in argument: Allchin v. Coulthard [2]; Hinckley Urban District Council v. West Midlands Gas Board [3]; North-Eastern Gas Board v. Leeds Corporation [4]; Reg. v. Minister of Housing and Local Government, ex parte Hove Corporation [5]; East Midlands Gas Board v. Doncaster Corporation.[6]

DANCKWERTS J. This is an action by the British Electricity Authority and the South-Western Electricity Board as plaintiffs. Both those bodies came into being by virtue of the Electricity Act, 1947, which vested certain assets previously belonging to electrical undertakers in new bodies, and they came into operation on April 1, 1948, which was the appointed day for the purposes of the Act. The defendants, the Corporation of Exeter, were electrical undertakers before the coming into operation of the Act. The action is concerned with the assets which, under the provisions of the Act, the plaintiffs, or one of them, became entitled to take over from the defendants as the previous undertakers. The second plaintiffs, the South-Western Electricity Board, have only been joined with the British Electricity Authority because of a possible doubt as to whether all of the assets under consideration might or might not have vested in the British Electricity Authority, as certain assets of certain kinds vest in the board and not in the authority. Nothing really, however, turns on that and I need not really consider the matter further.

The Act by section 14 provides: "(1) Subject to the provisions "of this Part of this Act all property, rights, liabilities and "obligations which, immediately before such date as may be " appointed by order of the Minister (in this Act referred to as " ' the vesting date ') were property, rights, liabilities and obligations of a body to whom this part of this Act applies, shall on " the vesting date vest by virtue of this Act and without further " assurance in such electricity board or boards as may be specified in the following provisions of this section or determined " thereunder. . . . (2) Subject to the provisions of this section " relating to the North of Scotland district—(a) the property, " rights, liabilities and obligations mentioned in subsection (1) " of this section of the Central Electricity Board, any power " station company and any electricity holding company, shall vest " in accordance with the said subsection (1) in the central " authority; (b) the property, rights, liabilities and obligations " aforesaid of any authorized undertakers to whom this part of " this Act applies (other than the Central Electricity Board) shall " vest as aforesaid in such one of the area boards as may be " determined by order of the minister: Provided that—(i) all " generating stations of any such authorized undertakers and " all main transmission lines of such undertakers, being lines " connecting a generating station directly with another generating " station or with any main transmission lines of the Central " Electricity Board, and all property and rights held or used by " the undertakers wholly or mainly for the purposes of such " stations and transmission lines and all liabilities and obligations " wholly or mainly incurred by the undertakers for those " purposes; (ii) all rights, liabilities and obligations under agreements between any authorized undertakers and any railway " undertakers for the supply of electricity to the railway " undertakers for the purposes of haulage or traction, and all " transmission lines used wholly or mainly for the purpose of " giving a supply to any railway undertakers for the purposes of " haulage or traction; and (iii) all investments and cash of any " such undertakers and all rights and liabilities thereof in respect " of income tax and excess profits tax; shall vest in the Central " Authority and not in an Area Board."

The difficulties in the present case really are concerned with the question of what vested in the plaintiffs; because the defendants, being a local authority, carried on not only the electrical undertaking but all the other activities which are normally carried on by a local authority. Therefore, it is necessary for the purposes of the Act to ascertain what part of the assets vested in the local authority are to be attributed to the electricity undertaking, and are therefore to be treated as vesting in the plaintiffs. There is a provision in section 15 (3) providing for the reference to the Minister of certain questions of this type. [His Lordship read the subsection.] But the present question has not been referred to the Minister because it was considered, as I understand, that the present question did not fall within the ambit of that subsection.

BRITISH ELECTRICITY AUTHORITY v. EXETER CORPORATION.

Danckwerts J.

Section 15 (1) of the Act, which has particular reference to the undertakings of local authorities, is in the following terms: "In the case of any authorized undertakers being a local "authority the provisions of the last foregoing section shall only "apply to property held or used by the local authority wholly or "mainly in their capacity as authorized undertakers, and rights, "liabilities and obligations acquired or incurred by the local "authority in the said capacity, and accordingly references in "that section to the property, rights, liabilities and obligations "of a body to whom this part of this Act applies, or to any "agreement to which any such body was a party, or to docu-"ments referring to any such body, or to legal proceedings or "applications by or against any such body shall be construed as "references to property held or used by the local authority "wholly or mainly in their capacity as authorized undertakers."

The question for decision is one which lies in a comparatively small compass, but is also one of considerable difficulty. It arises on the accounts which have been kept by the defendant corporation. It is plain that a sum of £33,355 which appears in the account headed "Net Revenue Account, 31st March, 1947," of the defendant corporation, stated to be a "transfer in aid of "rate," was wrongly transferred out of the account and should have been retained as part of the carry forward for the following year.

Before considering exactly how that is to be dealt with, it is necessary to deal with the position under the statutory provisions relating to electricity undertakings. The original Act dealing with these matters was the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899. [His Lordship read paragraph 7 of the Schedule to that Act, and continued:] That was the provision which applied to the defendant corporation until the passing of their local Act—one of a series of local Acts passed about that time, it appears, for the purpose of assisting local authorities to gain some benefits in respect of payments of income tax in regard to interest which they might have to pay to other persons. The local Act is the Exeter Corporation Act, 1935. The material provisions of that Act begin for the purposes of this case with section 108. Section 108 provides: "Notwithstanding anything contained in "any previous enactment all money received by the corporation "whether on capital or revenue account including (but without "prejudice to the generality of this provision)—(a) all money "received by the corporation on account of the revenue of any "undertaking of the corporation as from time to time existing "from which revenue is derived; and (b) interest and other "annual proceeds from time to time received by the corporation "on the investments or balances"—and so on—"shall be carried "to and form part of the general rate fund and all payments and "expenses made and incurred by the corporation in respect of "any such undertaking or in carrying into execution the powers "and provisions of this or any other Act whether public or local

" (including interest on moneys borrowed by the corporation and " all sums required by law to be paid or transferred or which the " corporation may determine to pay apply or transfer to any such " fund as is referred to in paragraph (b) of this subsection) shall " be paid or transferred out of the general rate fund." So, pausing there for a moment, it is plain that all the receipts of the corporation from its various operations and activities are to be paid into this general rate fund and will form part of that fund. On the other hand, all payments that have to be made by the corporation will have to be paid out of that fund. Then section 109 provides for the keeping of accounts. " The corpora- " tion notwithstanding the provisions of any Act or Order to the " contrary shall keep their accounts so as to distinguish capital " from revenue and shall keep separate accounts in respect of " each of the undertakings of the corporation as from time to time " existing from which revenue is derived (each of which is in this " section separately referred to as ' the undertaking ') and as to " revenue shall show under a separate heading or division on the " one side all receipts in respect of the undertaking (including " the income from any such fund as is referred to in para- " graph (b) of subsection (1) of the last preceding section of this " Act provided in connexion with the undertaking) and on the " other side all payments and expenses in respect of the under- " taking such payments and expenses being divided so as also " to show the amounts representing "—a number of things which are set forth as matters which are to be shown in the accounts. Then section 110 contains certain provisions as to the application of the revenue of the undertaking which I need not read. Section 111 provides for a reserve fund. I think that I can go to section 112, which is the vital section for the purposes of the present action. Section 112 provides:

[His Lordship read subsection (1), and continued:] Then there is a provision which I need not read about reserve funds. By subsection (3): " Subsection (1) of section 7 of the Schedule to " the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899 shall be deemed to " have ceased to be incorporated with any of the Acts or Orders " relating to the electricity undertaking." So it was plain that when this Act came into force the provisions of the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, no longer applied, and the situation is regulated for the present purposes entirely by the terms of section 112 of the Act of 1935.

That being the situation, I can return to the accounts of the corporation to see what has happened. Taking, first of all, the revenue account of March 31, 1947, I find on the right-hand side the credits—first, the balance of March 31, 1946, brought forward in accordance with the provisions of section 12, amounting to £42,161 8s. Then there are credits in respect of the sale of fittings and on account of generation and the transfer of certain small items to the Central Electricity Board, interest on sinking fund investment, reserve and renewals fund, contingencies reserve (amount not required), and finally, an item "War damage "insurance: reserve written back, £40,000." That requires a word of explanation. Undertakings of this kind were exempted from the provisions of the War Damage Acts of 1941 and 1943 on the supposition or provision that separate provisions were intended to be made by Parliament to deal with such cases, and eventually provision was made by an Act of 1948 for that purpose. But in the meantime in each of four war years ending, I think, in 1945, the corporation had set aside from revenue a sum of £10,000 as a contingent reserve against the liability which might arise in the future under such statutory provisions as were envisaged by the Acts of 1941 and 1943. What has happened was that in this year that £40,000, the accumulation of four years, was treated as no longer used for the purpose and has been brought back as a credit in the revenue account. Those credits came to a total of £92,805 17s. On the debit side there is a loss, first, on the undertaking which was described as "Balance from revenue account, "£4,739 3s. 4d." There is certain redemption of debt and interest, £10,232 odd, revenue contributions to capital amounting to £3,346 1s. 6d., and then we come to that item of £33,355 which I have already mentioned and which is treated as a transfer in aid of rate. It is further described in the balance sheet as "Balance of "contributions, 1926/27–1942/43. Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926 "(Fifth Schedule) as amended by Exeter Corporation Act, 1935 "(Section 112)." It is therefore treated as though it represented contributions over a number of years. But in the argument before me that contention or allocation was abandoned, and it was simply argued on the footing that this was a transfer in this year of £33.355 from the revenue account in respect of the electricity undertaking for the benefit of the rates. Then there is a provision relating to income tax, and a contribution in aid of rates for 1946/47 of £830, which represents the 1½ per cent. on the amount of the outstanding debt according to the provisions of section 112. Then there is an item in respect of adaptation of certain premises. Then the result is that the debits show a credit balance to make up a total of £37,099 0s. 4d. That sum of £37,099 0s. 4d. was the amount which was carried forward to the following year ending on March 31, 1948. The contention of the plaintiffs is that the transfer of £33,355 to the rates account, or, rather, in aid of rate—because it is already, of course, in one sense in the rates account —was not authorized and was a breach of the duty of the undertakers under the Act, and therefore that the balance carried forward ought to have been in the region of £70,000 instead of merely being some £37,000.

Turning to the account for March 31, 1948, which, of course, is a period ending immediately before the appointed day, we find credited the sum of £37,099 odd, and various other items. We find on the other side that at this time there is a loss of £21,963 15s. 3d., and there are items "Contribution in aid of rate

Danckwerts J.

" for 1947/48, £800," and " Contribution in aid of rate for 1948/49 "—which, of course, would be after the date of taking over—" £1,000." That leaves a balance of £15,410 9s. 7d. It is only that sum of £15,410 9s. 7d. of which the plaintiffs obtain the benefit, instead, as they contend should be the case, of a sum larger by a considerable amount. As regards the two items amounting to £1,800, it was contended originally that the £1,000 was quite unauthorized as being in regard to a future year. But on examination of the figures it appears that if one takes the amount of the debt at the end of the financial year 1947/48 and not the beginning, 1½ per cent. of that amount would allow a figure to be transferred of £1,930, and that therefore it was possible, if that was the correct date to take, that these two payments could be justified, not indeed as partly a payment in respect of 1948/49, but within a figure of £50 in respect of the year 1947/48. I do not see any reason why the corporation should not take the amount standing at the end of their financial year as the basis for their figure for calculating the 1½ per cent. Therefore, I do not propose to trouble further about those two amounts of £800 and £1,000, because that would be the amount allowed upon that view to be transferred to the rates.

It is also to be observed before leaving the accounts that in the final balance sheet of the undertaking on March 31, 1948, on the basis of which it appears that the transfer to the Electricity Authority was actually made, there are these items to be considered. On the revenue account there are, on one side, investments amounting to £95,500, which represents a reserve fund, and there are stock and stores in hand and sundry debtors, the benefit of which was all transferred to the British Electricity Authority. On the other side there are sundry creditors amounting to £99,225, reserve and renewals amounting to £96,000 odd, that sum of £15,410 9s. 7d. which came from the net revenue account which I have just referred to, and there is an overdraft described as " Cash due to bank " amounting to £54,463 12s. 8d. In fact, a cheque was paid over by the British Electricity Authority to the corporation to discharge that sum. It is true that there was a reservation that such payment was made before the account had been examined in order to prevent further bank interest being incurred. But in fact there was a payment made to the corporation on the basis that there was an overdraft which was owing by the electricity undertaking of the corporation and which had therefore to be borne by the British Electricity Authority on the taking over.

I now come to the questions which have to be decided in this case. It is contended by the plaintiffs that they are entitled to be recouped the loss which they have suffered by the breach of the defendants' statutory duties in not carrying over as they should have done, as they claim, a larger sum amounting to an increase of £33,355. On the other hand, it is contended by the defendants, first, that those items which are in the accounts are merely matters of book entries. Their contention is that there is simply a general rate fund and that everything is paid in or out of that rate fund, and that therefore one cannot say that there is any actual cash which is attributable to the electricity undertaking more than to any other particular activity of the corporation. Secondly, say the defendants: Whatever might be the situation, there is no prohibition in the corporation's Act as it now stands like that which was contained in the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, and that therefore there was nothing whatever to prevent the defendants paying over in aid of the rate fund part of the surplus of revenue over the outgoings in any particular year; and that therefore what they have done cannot possibly be attacked on that ground. Finally, as I understand it, there was a third contention, and that was that the £40,000, which was brought back from what might be termed a special reserve fund in respect of war damage contingency, ought not to have been brought into the revenue fund, but ought to have been simply treated as coming back into the general rates fund and, therefore, forms no part of any balance which ought to be carried forward from 1947 to 1948. Those are very shortly the contentions which were put forward.

I was referred to certain authorities, including a number of cases with regard to gas undertakings. I do not propose to go into the authorities relating to gas undertakings, although they were properly called to my attention, because I do not think that they assist in the present case, as there were no similar provisions in regard to gas undertakings respecting amounts to be paid over as there were with regard to electricity supply. There are, however, two cases in regard to electricity undertakings which I should mention in regard to the present matter. In Reg. v. Minister of Housing and Local Government, ex parte Hove Corporation [1] it was held that the sum that was in the bank at the vesting date amounting to £17,520, which had been received by the corporation from transactions in its capacity as electricity undertakers, and which, pursuant to section 188 of the Local Government Act, 1933, was carried to the general rate fund of the borough, and included in that fund immediately before the vesting date, was surplus net revenue which the local authority "were not entitled to use for "general purposes of rate reduction except to the limited extent "authorized by section 7 of the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, "1899, as amended; that they held the balance in their capacity "as undertakers and in no other capacity; and that it constituted "property or rights acquired by the local authority wholly or "mainly in their capacity as authorized undertakers within the "meaning of section 15 (1) of the Act of 1947, and accordingly "vested in the Central Electricity Authority." That case, of course, depended on the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, and the provisions which contained a prohibition of the transfer to the benefit of the rates of more than 1½ per cent. ascertained on the amount as mentioned in section 7 of the Schedule to that Act, which was a very definite provision which would prevent the general rates fund acquiring the benefit of the sum in question to the exclusion of the electricity undertaking of the local authority. It seems that that case cannot affect the matter which I have to consider, and I do not find that it helps me.

There is a very important case—Allchin v. Coulthard[2]—concerning the South Shields Corporation, who had an electricity undertaking and a local Act not dissimilar from the local Act of the Exeter Corporation. That was a case in regard to income tax, and was a decision of the Court of Appeal in favour of the local authority. It was affirmed by the House of Lords,[3] which expressly approved the judgment of Lord Greene M.R. Therefore, it is his very important and illuminating judgment which bears the authority of the House of Lords. The headnote is as follows: "The phrase 'profits or gains brought into charge' as "used in rules 19 and 21 of the General Rules Applicable to All "Schedules to the Income Tax Act, 1918, does not indicate the "cash resources out of which the payment of the interest is in "fact made, but a fund in the accountancy sense of taxed profits "up to but not exceeding the amount of the assessment ascer-"tained for the purpose of an account between the taxpayer and "the revenue and deemed to be in his hands, to which the "payment of the interest is to be debited. No profits which "cannot be lawfully applied to the payment of the interest can "be treated by the taxpayer as forming this fund or any part "of it, but subject to this, apart from special circumstances, "instances of which are provided by Birmingham Corporation v. "Inland Revenue Commissioners[4] and Central London Railway "v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[5] the taxpayer is entitled to "treat the interest as having been paid out of that fund, no "matter out of what cash resources he in fact paid it. [South "Shields] Corporation paid out of their general rate fund, which "consisted partly of untaxed income (namely, the rates col-"lected)"—which, of course, are not subject to tax—"and "partly of profits from its undertakings duly assessed to income "tax, interest on a loan raised for the purpose of their electricity "and transport undertakings and general purposes, deducting "income tax in the usual way. The corporation claimed, under "the provisions of the South Shields Corporation Act, 1935, to "treat the assessed profits of the electricity and transport under-"takings as part of the assessed profits out of which the interest "was paid and to retain the amount of tax paid on those "profits:—Held, reversing the decision of Lawrence J., that by "the provisions of the Act the profits of those undertakings could "lawfully be applied to the payment of the interest on the whole " of the loan, and, consequently, those profits as assessed to " income tax formed part of the profits brought into charge out " of which the interest was paid or deemed to be paid, notwith- " standing that it appeared from the accounts of those under- " takings, kept separately as required by the Act, that the surplus " revenues of those undertakings had been treated as applied to " certain specified purposes of those undertakings."

The South Shields Corporation Act contains, as I have said, provisions not dissimilar from the Exeter Corporation Act. Sections from section 108 onwards in the Exeter Corporation Act correspond closely to section 112 onwards of the South Shields Act. The provisions contained in section 112 of the Exeter Corporation Act and section 115 of the South Shields Act are almost identical, except for certain differences which are contained in sub-paragraph (b) of subsection (2) (ii) of the South Shields Act, of which subsection (2) provides: " (ii) any moneys " applied to a fund for providing working capital "—that is, after the provision in respect of how you ascertain the surplus—" then " (a) if the reserve fund in respect of the electricity undertaking " does not amount to more than one-twentieth of the aggregate " capital expended for the time being upon the undertaking the " charges for electricity supplied by the corporation shall be " reduced by such amount or respective amounts as will as nearly " as reasonably practicable be equivalent in the aggregate to the " said excess "—that is exactly similar to the provision contained in the Exeter Act—" (b) if the said reserve fund amounts to more " than one-twentieth of the said aggregate capital the corporation " shall fix such amount as they may think fit (not being less in " any case in which the said excess is more than a sum equal to " one and a half per centum of the outstanding debt of the under- " taking than the difference between that sum and the said " excess) and the charges for electricity supplied by the corpora- " tion shall be reduced by such amount or respective amounts as " will as nearly as reasonably practicable be equivalent in the " aggregate to the amount so fixed." In other words, the difference between that provision and the provision contained in section 112 of the Exeter Act is that the Exeter Act provides that such amount as the corporation may think fit " shall be credited " to the revenue account of the undertaking for the next following " year." Both provide " the charges for electricity supplied by the " corporation shall be reduced by such amount or respective " amounts as will as nearly as reasonably practicable be equiva- " lent in the aggregate " (in the case of the South Shields Act) " to the amount so fixed," and in the case of the Exeter Act " to " the amount so deemed to be revenue."

I cite these passages to show that the provisions in the South Shields Act are very similar to those in the Exeter Act, but there was that difference. Later on I shall proceed to consider whether that difference makes a vital change or not.

BRITISH ELECTRICITY AUTHORITY v. EXETER CORPORATION.

Danckwerts J.

Of course, the subject-matter of the decision in Allchin v. Coulthard [6] was very different, in a sense, from the subject-matter in the present case. The question was simply this: Where a payment is made out of the general rate fund for interest, that interest could be taken as being paid out of a fund which had already borne tax, so that the local authority making the payment were entitled to retain the amount of the tax deducted after paying the interest on the basis that they had already paid the tax.

That point is very different from the present, but it was relied on, I think, principally by the defendants, because of the distinction drawn by Lord Greene M.R. between an amount which represents actual money and one which really simply represented figures on paper. To put it shortly, on pages 234 and 235 there is a passage which I think explains in very clear language what the Master of the Rolls really meant. He said: "Much of the obscurity which surrounds this matter is due to a "failure to distinguish the two senses in which the phrase 'pay-"'ment out of a fund' may be used. The word 'fund' may "mean actual cash resources of a particular kind (e.g. money "in a drawer or a bank), or it may be a mere accountancy "expression used to describe a particular category which a person "uses in making up his accounts. The words 'payment out of' "when used in connexion with the word 'fund' in its first mean-"ing connote actual payment, e.g. by taking the money out of "the drawer or drawing a cheque on the bank. When used in "connexion with the word 'fund' in its second meaning they "connote that, for the purposes of the account in which the fund "finds a place, the payment is debited to that fund, an operation "which, of course, has no relation to the actual method of "payment or the particular cash resources out of which the pay-"ment is made. Thus, if a company makes a payment out of its "reserve fund—an example of the second meaning of the word "'fund'—the actual payment is made by cheque drawn on the "company's banking account, the money in which may have "been derived from a number of sources. The phrase 'reserve "'fund' only has a meaning as indicating the item in the "company's accounts to which it decides to debit the payment. "It will be seen, therefore, that to speak of an actual payment "being made out of a fund in the second sense is really a misuse "of language. A fund in the second sense is merely an "accountancy category. It has a real existence in that sense, "but not in the sense that a real payment can be made out of it "as distinct from being debited to it. Unless these two meanings "of the phrase 'payment out of a fund' are kept distinct, much "confusion of thought must ensue. A real payment cannot be "made out of an imaginary fund: per Lord Macmillan in the "Central London Railway case.[7]" The result of that is that he reaches the conclusion that there was nothing to prevent the corporation in the South Shields case from treating payments of interest as being paid out of the profits of its undertaking, and therefore funds which had already been subject to tax and had borne tax.

[7] [1937] A.C. 77.

It may be that in the present case the fund which is treated as a fund in the accounts relating to the electricity undertaking of the Exeter Corporation is a fund in the second sense in which it is used by Lord Greene, that is to say, that all the actual funds are in the general rates account, but that for the purposes of the undertaking certain funds are treated as falling to that undertaking, and that therefore those must be regarded not as cash separated in that way, but merely as a series of book-keeping entries for the purposes of ascertaining the financial situation of the electricity undertaking. I am prepared to accept that, but I do not think that it necessarily follows that that disposes of the claim of the plaintiffs, because it seems to me that, in considering what is to be taken over by the Electricity Authority in the present case, one has to ascertain what are to be treated as the assets of the Exeter Corporation in respect of its electricity undertaking. Therefore it is not an answer to say that those are merely entries on paper and merely entries in accounts. They have to be treated under the provisions of the Exeter Corporation Act, 1935, as part of the assets of the electricity undertaking of the corporation, and, that being so, when you find that those assets are to be taken over by the body which is created by the Electricity Act, 1947, it may well be that it is those assets or the amount equivalent to those assets which has to be handed over, and it is not an answer to say: "Of course, the moneys "actually are not in a separate account; they are in the general "rates account of the corporation."

I turn again, therefore, to the provisions of the Act. What I find is that, in the event which has happened, one must ascertain on the operations for the year—and I agree with the contention of Sir Andrew Clark, of course, that the provisions of section 112 are clearly related to operations of a given year—first of all, if in that year the revenue of the undertaking exceeds the expenditure mentioned under the various heads of section 109 of the Act. If one finds that there is an excess of revenue over expenditure, then one proceeds to apply the provisions which are found in the section. We have in this case, of course, provisions to be applied under subsection (1) (b) of the section because the reserve fund amounts to more than one-twentieth of the aggregate capital expenditure. What has to happen then is that first the corporation have to decide what amount shall be credited to the revenue account, and they are entitled to take out, as we know, 1½ per cent. of the outstanding debt of the undertaking and credit that to the benefit of the rates. Then the section says that there shall be credited to the revenue account of the undertaking for the next following year that sum, and the charges for electricity supplied by the corporation shall be reduced to correspond as nearly as possible with that sum, by which I understand that it is intended, theoretically at any rate, that the charges for the following year to be made by the corporation will be reduced so that the revenue received in respect thereof by the corporation will in the following year be less if possible by the amount which is carried over in the accounts, and the amount which is carried over in the accounts is so "deemed to be revenue." It seems to me that if it is to be revenue, it has got to be considered as revenue of the following year. It was contended then by Sir Andrew Clark that one merely treated it as revenue for that year with the result that at the end of the year it went back again for the benefit of the rates. I think that that was the effect of his argument. The effect, as I think he made it on the figures, was that if that course had been adopted by the corporation the result would have been that the plaintiffs would, instead of being underpaid, have in fact been overpaid. Now it seems to me that that construction will not work. It produces, I agree, some odd results, because it means that the amount carried over will in a sense be carried over again possibly until it is extinguished, with the result that the charges will again have to be reduced and possibly there may eventually be a loss which will require the charges to be increased again; whereas, according to this view—which was attractive in many respects—once one had carried over the sums so carried over to the following year one would theoretically, if the adjustments and charges were perfectly accurate, simply wipe out the surplus so carried over, and would be left in hand with revenue equivalent to the expenditure for the following year and the sum carried over would be left intact. One would then have a state of equilibrium, all being well, and one would go on from year to year without having to reduce the charges unless the expense of generation or other charges were so reduced that a further excessive profit was made. I do not think, however, that that was the effect of the section, because whatever may have been the intention of the draftsman of the provisions, it seems to me that it cannot produce that result. If the sum carried over forms part of the revenue of the following year, it is deemed to be revenue for that year by the Act. Then it appears that it must again come into consideration in ascertaining at the end of that year whether there is an excess of revenue over the outgoings, as contemplated by section 109 of the Act. If one finds that on setting-off the two sums against each other there is again an excess of revenue over expenditure, I do not see how one can escape from the necessity of having to apply the provisions of section 112 again, and again you have the result that you may have to reduce the charges further. I do not know whether that was the intention of the Act or not, but it seems to me to be the result. In my view, accordingly, that Act requires the whole of the excess of revenue over expenditure in any given year to be carried over to the following year and to be deemed to be revenue of that following year, and that the only amount that may be carried to the aid of the rates is the 1½ per cent. on the amount of the debt.

That being so I must reach the conclusion that the £33,355 ought to have been carried over to the year ending on March 31, 1948, as revenue of that year, in addition to the sum of £37,099 0s. 4d. which was in fact carried over.

I think that the only other matter with which I have to deal is the sum of £40,000. That undoubtedly represents revenue of the undertaking originally, and I cannot see how it could have been dealt with, when brought back again as no longer required for the contingent liability, except by bringing it back into the revenue account. It appears that it was brought back into the accounts in a way which was perfectly proper, and that it must be treated, therefore, as being part of the revenue of the year into which it was brought. I was very much impressed by the point which was taken by Mr. Willis, that if one were entitled to depart from these accounts and treat them as having no real value at all, but simply as mere book-keeping assets, it was difficult to see how the plaintiffs could have been responsible for the overdraft of £54,463 12s. 8d. In my view one must treat these accounts as showing the assets of the undertaking for the purposes of the take over required by the Act of 1947, because otherwise, if one merely treats the sums received by the corporation in respect of its electricity undertaking as part of the revenue paid into the general rates account, one must treat the liabilities in the same way. Therefore, in my view there would have been no justification for requiring the plaintiffs to discharge the overdraft shown in the balance sheet of the undertaking.

Accordingly, in my view, the plaintiffs are justified in the claim which they make that they have suffered financial loss to the extent of £33,355, and there will be an order for payment of that sum to the plaintiffs by the defendants.

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Fencing—Duty to guard against acts reasonably foreseeable, including unreasonable behaviour of operatives—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants on a pastry rolling machine which was so fenced as to leave a space between the fence and the bed of the machine sufficiently wide for an operative to thrust a hand through the space. The plaintiff put down the guard properly, and then, contrary to her instructions, put her hand through the space to push odd pieces of dough against the moving rollers, with the result that her fingers were injured. She claimed damages, alleging that her injury was due to a breach by the defendants of their statutory duty under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, to keep the dangerous part of the machine "securely fenced":—

Held, that the machine was not securely fenced within the meaning of section 14 of the Act of 1937, and that the plaintiff's act, though constituting contributory negligence, did not involve a notional breaking of the fence. The standard of duty on the employer under the section was to give protection not only against accidental happenings but also against acts and omissions reasonably foreseeable—and the plaintiff's action was reasonably foreseeable—including negligent, indolent, ill-advised and even frivolous acts of operatives.

Dicta of Lord Normand in Lyon v. Don Brothers, Buist & Co. Ld. 1944 S.C. (J.) 1, 5, applied.

Decision of Oliver J. reversed.

In view of the plaintiff's contributory negligence judgment was entered for her for 40 per cent. of the damages to be assessed.

APPEAL from Oliver J.

The plaintiff, Miss Betty Smith, an infant, was employed as a baker by the defendants, the Chesterfield and District Co-operative Society Ld., at their bakery department, the premises being a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937. She was in charge of a puff-pastry machine, which consisted of a long table with a pair of rollers, the bottom roller being fixed, and the top moving slightly up and down according to the thickness of the bed of dough which was being put through. The rollers had a guard over them which came down to within three-and-a-quarter inches at the lowest point from the table to protect the dangerous side of the nip and to prevent the operator's fingers from coming into contact with the moving rollers. Thus there was a space between the guard and the bed of the machine of something over three inches, sufficient to take a bed of dough three inches thick.

The plaintiff's duty was to manipulate a lump of dough about three inches thick, consisting of layers of margarine and dough, first by rolling or beating it with a hand roller, and then, as the pastry was heavy, by putting it back and forth through the mechanical rollers. There were usually some small pieces of dough left at the end of the run which had not been taken in the nip. The plaintiff's duty then was to stop the machine, collect the small pieces into a lump, roll them, this time with a hand roller, and put them back on the bed of dough to go through the rollers when the dough was coming back through the machine in the reverse order.

The operators who worked the machines were given special directions and training, and they were specifically forbidden to put the small pieces of dough collected from the ends back into the machine, but were instructed to roll them with a rolling pin, the reason being that if the small pieces were pushed up tight against the rollers when the machine was working there was a danger of the operator's fingers coming into contact with the rollers.

On January 13, 1950, the plaintiff, then aged 16, stopped the machine, collected the pieces of dough, and then, because it was heavy work to roll them out again by hand, put them back in the machine and put the guard down as instructed. She then put her hand into the space under the guard to push the odd dough up against the roller. The machine was working, her fingers were cut, and she suffered injury.

The plaintiff, by her father, claimed damages from the defendants, alleging breach of statutory duty under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] in failing securely to fence the rollers, which were a dangerous part of the machine, or to provide an automatic device to prevent the plaintiff's fingers from coming into contact with the rollers.

The defendants denied negligence and, alternatively, alleged that the plaintiff, having put her hand under the guard deliberately and unnecessarily for some purpose of her own, had been guilty of contributory negligence.

Oliver J. found that the plaintiff was an intelligent girl who had been properly instructed. He said that since the essence of section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, was that there should be fencing against accident and not against deliberation, he was bound, once he had found that the plaintiff had acted contrary to instructions and with knowledge that she was acting wrongly, to hold that her act had become a deliberate and notional, though not a physical, breaking of the fence. In his view, the machine was adequately fenced against accident; there could be no fence incapable of being broken; and since the plaintiff had broken the fence notionally with her hand, she could not succeed in a claim under the Factories Act. He gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff now appealed.

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts and continued:—It has been said repeatedly that the provisions of the Factories Acts with regard to fencing are not meant to apply only to preventing accidents to careful workmen. It is recognized that in workshops and factories people are not always careful: they are very often thoughtless, and sometimes they deliberately do things which they ought not to do and which result in very serious injury.

I need not go through all the cases which have laid down that fencing is intended to protect the careless and the ignorant as well as the careful and the well-instructed, because in Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons Ld.[1] Somervell L.J.[2] cited a passage from the judgment of Lord Normand, the Lord Justice-General, in Lyon v. Don Brothers, Buist & Co. Ld.,[3] who said: "It can be "appositely said that the standard to be observed is a fence which "will prevent accidents from occurring in circumstances which "may be reasonably anticipated, but the circumstances which "may be reasonably anticipated include a great deal more than "the staid, prudent, well-regulated conduct of men diligently "attentive to their work, and the occupiers of factories are bound "to reckon on the possibility of conduct very different from that. "They are bound to take into account the possibility of negli-"gent, ill-advised or indolent conduct on the part of their "employees, and even of frivolous conduct, especially where "young workers are employed. If the fencing is to secure "operatives against injury which may reasonably be anticipated "in that sense, then I am of opinion that there was a contra-"vention of the section of the Act."

The guard here was put there for the very purpose of preventing operatives from touching or getting their fingers up against the rollers. The only point was that it was not sufficiently secure. It was a guard through which a girl could put her hand, and it is quite obvious that some means might have been taken, by means of a roller which would rise or fall, to prevent that sort of thing. Our attention was called by Mr. Tristram Beresford to the proviso to section 14 of the Factories Act, which, with all respect to him, I think operates against the defendants in this case. Section 14 is the section which requires all dangerous parts to be "securely fenced"—not merely "fenced," but "securely "fenced"; and then, because it is recognized that there may be machinery which makes a permanent fence impracticable, it is provided "that, in so far as the safety of a dangerous part of "any machinery cannot by reason of the nature of the operation "be secured by means of a fixed guard, the requirements of this "subsection shall be deemed to have been complied with if a "device is provided which automatically prevents the operator "from coming into contact with that part." If this guard had come down when the dough was no longer there so that it touched the bed of the machine in such a way as to prevent a person's hands going through, then it would have been a sufficient guard; and no doubt if an operative deliberately picked up the guard and put her hand through the machine, very different considerations would apply.

We are asked to say that this was a finding of fact by the judge with which we cannot interfere, but we take a different view from the judge on this point. He thought that because the girl deliberately put her hand underneath this guard—that is, through the space which was left between the guard and the bed of the machine—that was equivalent to breaking or taking away the guard and that, therefore, the employers were not liable. With all respect to the judge, I do not agree with that view. Here was a guard through which it was possible for a girl, without breaking the guard, to get her hand in conjunction with the rollers. It seems to me, therefore, that it is impossible to say that the dangerous part of the machine—that is to say, the moving rollers—was "securely fenced."

For these reasons I think that there was a breach of statutory duty. Of course, the girl was guilty of contributory negligence. She was guilty of doing a deliberate act which she ought to have known was highly dangerous, and which anybody would see was highly dangerous; she had been warned, and had been instructed, about it. But that it was foreseeable on the part of the employers that that might be done is clear, because not only was the guard provided to prevent fingers getting into contact with the rollers, but these employees were instructed on it. It cannot be said that it was not foreseeable. The fact is that the guard was not adequate, but the girl had been guilty of folly and direct disobedience to orders in doing what she did. Therefore it is impossible that she should be allowed to recover the whole of the damages. Had it not been for the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, she would have got nothing. As it is, the court has come to the conclusion that the damages should be apportioned 60:40—that is to say, she will recover 40 per cent. of whatever sum may be awarded.

JENKINS L.J. I agree. Mr. Tristram Beresford, for the employers, contended that the question whether or not this machine was "securely fenced" in accordance with the requirements of section 14 of the Factories Act was a question of fact on which the judge had reached his conclusion after hearing and seeing the witnesses, and that this court ought not therefore to interfere with that conclusion. It is, of course, obvious that the question whether any particular machine is "securely fenced" in accordance with the statutory duty must be judged with reference to the facts of each particular case. That is no more than a truism. But it is equally obvious that the question must be judged by reference to the right principle of law, and here, to my mind, the judge was in error when he said, after stating the facts: "But on those facts how can she succeed in an action "under the Factories Act? I do not think that she can. The "essence of the provision of section 14 of the Factories Act, "from what I know of the cases and from what has been cited "to me, seems to be that there should be a fencing against "accident and not a fencing against deliberation."

The judge, having laid down that principle for his guidance, came to the conclusion that the act in this case, being a deliberate act, was tantamount to a breaking of the fence and involved no breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants inasmuch as the fence provided was a sufficient protection against anything except a deliberate act amounting to a breaking of the fence.

To my mind, the judge's statement of the principle of law by which he was guided states far too narrowly the duty of the employer under section 14. It is plain from the passage from the judgment of Lord Normand in Lyon v. Don Brothers, Buist & Co.[3] cited in Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons Ld.[4] in the judgment of Somervell L.J., that the security to be provided by means of the fencing extends not merely to protection against accidental occurrences but to protection also against "negligent, "ill-advised or indolent conduct"; and it extends also, in my judgment, to conduct such as that of the plaintiff in the present case. The test, as was said by du Parcq J. in Walker v. Bletchley Flettons Ld.,[5] is this: "In considering whether "machinery is dangerous"—and, one might add there, whether it is securely fenced—"it must not be assumed that everybody "will always be careful. A part of a machine is dangerous if it is "a possible cause of injury to anybody acting in a way in which "a human being may be reasonably expected to act in circumstances which may reasonably be expected to occur." I may add this comment from Redgrave (18th ed., p. 32): "This, "which is the test now most commonly applied, is, it is submitted, the correct one. In spite of the first sentence of the "test, the same learned judge had in Stimpson v. Standard "Telephones and Cables Ld.[6] to complain that the test had in "some quarters been misunderstood. The behaviour of human "beings that has to be regarded is such behaviour as is reasonably foreseeable which is not necessarily confined to such "behaviour as is reasonable behaviour."

It seems to me not open to doubt that the action of the plaintiff, unreasonable as it may have been, was behaviour on her part which was reasonably foreseeable by the defendant employers. That seems to me to be demonstrated by the fact that Mr. Naylor, the defendants' bakery manager, when asked what instructions were given to the staff concerning the machine and the use of the guard, said this: "Yes. We have always "given the staff instructions that, when they put the paste "through and it comes that they have small pieces to finish "off, they must not use the machine for the small ends; they "must use a rolling pin, because it is awkward practice to "put small pieces through the machine, and also dangerous." It appears clear, therefore, that this procedure of putting small pieces through the machine was one which the employers had in mind and against which they thought it necessary to caution their employees. It was, therefore, a foreseeable act of anyone working the machine. The guard was so constructed as to leave room between the table and the lower member of the guard sufficient for a person minded to follow this forbidden procedure to thrust his or her hand through, with a view to putting the small pieces between the rollers, and thus get the hand caught in the nip.

Accordingly, I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be allowed.

MORRIS L.J. I am in full agreement with the judgments which have been delivered.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated May 22, 1899, Thomas Henry, who died on March 22, 1901, gave a number of specific and pecuniary legacies which included a bequest of £2,000 to his trustees on trust to pay the income thereof to his grandniece, Margaret Alice Mussett, "until she marries and then to settle the said sum "upon her for her benefit as my trustees may think best." The testator devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to his trustees as therein mentioned.

Margaret Alice Mussett never married and died on September 20, 1951.

A summons was taken out by the sole surviving trustee of the will to ascertain (inter alia) whether the legacy of £2,000 was "vested absolutely and indefeasibly in her legal personal repre-"sentative as part of her estate notwithstanding she died with-"out ever having been married," or whether on her death the legacy fell into residue.

HENRY, In re. MUSSETT v. HENRY.

UPJOHN J. This summons gives rise to an interesting point of construction.

[After stating the question raised by the summons his lordship continued:] I propose in the first place to consider the construction of this clause quite apart from any authority. There is a gift of income to Margaret Mussett until she marries, and then a direction to settle the sum on her for her benefit. That plainly means on her marriage. Apart from authority, I should have thought that a gift until marriage was necessarily a gift which must come to an end on death or marriage, and that is then followed by a gift of corpus on marriage; but, nothing being said with regard to the disposition of corpus on death unmarried, that, apart from authority, I should have thought, was undisposed of, and therefore fell into residue.

It is said, however, that there are authorities which bind me to hold that this is an indefinite gift of income until marriage and that, as the beneficiary died a spinster, that indefinite gift of income continues and carries the corpus. The principle which it is said is applicable was first laid down in Rishton v. Cobb.[1] In that case there was a direction to invest the sum of £2,000 in the names of the trustees and to pay the income to the legatee "so long as she shall continue single and unmarried." There was no gift over in express terms of the income or of the corpus on marriage. Lord Cottenham L.C. said[2]: "If, therefore, "she had been single and unmarried, and had so remained, she "would have been entitled to the dividends, without any limita- "tion of time. Her interest would not have been determinable "by her death, but (independently of the forfeiture upon aliena- "tion) only by her ceasing to be single and unmarried. This is "different from a gift of dividends during widowhood. The "state of widowhood must determine with the life of the "widow; but the gift, so long as the legatee shall remain single "and unmarried, must be considered as requiring the act of "marriage to determine the interest. This gift, therefore, is of "the dividends of stock, without limitation as to time, which "carries the stock itself."

That decision has been severely criticized since. In In re Boddington[3] Lord Selborne (who was then Lord Chancellor), sitting in the Court of Appeal, plainly disapproved of the decision. He said: "With regard to the case of Rishton v. Cobb[4] the "respect I feel for the great judge who decided it prevents my "saying more of the judgment than that I do not understand it, "and that if it were applicable to this case I should hesitate for "some time before I could follow it."

However, in 1901, Sir George Farwell, then a judge of first instance, in In re Howard,[5] considering the passage from which

HENRY, In re. MUSSETT v. HENRY.

Upjohn J.

I have already read, said: "I understand Lord Selborne to "mean that Rishton v. Cobb [6] can be supported on the ground "stated by Lord Cottenham in the above passage. The Court of "Appeal did not, and in my opinion could not, overrule it, and "it is binding on me." In that case again it is to be observed that the direction was for payment to the wife so long as she remained unmarried, and there was no further disposition of corpus.

The matter came again before the Court of Appeal in In re Mason [7] and there again the decision in Rishton v. Cobb [8] came in for somewhat severe criticism. Lord Cozens-Hardy M.R. said with regard to the will in suit: "It will be observed here that there "is not in form an absolute indefinite gift of income to Alice. In "form it is limited up to a time. It is until she shall marry. It "will also be observed that there is a gift over of the residue to the "sons in the event of her marriage—a gift over of the residue, "diminished only in that event by a capital gift of £3,000 to the "daughter. The question of construction for us to determine is "whether on the face of this will, having regard to that gift over, "we are bound to say that by construction there is an absolute "indefinite gift of income to Alice, and that the period which and "which alone was to limit it has never happened and can never "happen, and that therefore the gift over can never take effect." Then he proceeds to discuss the decision in Rishton v. Cobb [9] by which Joyce J. had reluctantly felt bound him. After discussing that case, the Master of the Rolls continued: "A similar point "came before Farwell J. in In re Howard.[10] There there was no "gift over—nothing whatever but a simple trust to pay the income "to Amelia Howard so long as she remained unmarried. Far-"well J. held that in the absence of a gift over the passage I have "read from Rishton v. Cobb [11] ought to be followed, that he had "no power to overrule it, and that the lady was therefore entitled "absolutely. In the present case I think there is enough in the "fact of the gift over to enable us to hold that the gift here is to be "read as a gift to the daughter during her life or until marriage, "and, that being so, I think that the gift over, although it is only "expressed to be a gift over on her marriage, falls within the "well-known rule of Jones v. Westcomb [12] and takes effect either "on the death or on the marriage of Alice—in the case of her "marriage, subject to the deduction of the £3,000 legacy to her; "in the case of her death, without any such deduction. On the "whole, therefore, I think that the judgment of Joyce J. must be "reversed and that this appeal must be allowed."

" interest. The question is whether that is right. Now Alice does " not take an absolute interest unless there in an indefinite gift " of income. Reading this will I cannot find that there is. There " is a gift of income to Alice until a time, and after that time there " is another gift, a gift of the corpus. The testatrix has divided the " time into two periods, one until Alice marries, and the other " after she marries. She disposes of the income during the first " period and she disposes of the capital at the commencement of " the second period. There is no indefinite gift of income." Then he discusses Rishton v. Cobb,[14] and expresses the view that he cannot follow the decision of Lord Cottenham.

The fact, however, remains, that Farwell J. regarded the authority of Rishton v. Cobb [15] as binding on him. It has, as I have pointed out, been criticized, but in every case where it has been criticized it has been distinguishable, and I regard it as binding on me, if it is applicable to the particular words of this will: but I do not regard it as so applicable. I think that the testator has given income to Miss Mussett until marriage and then disposes of the corpus. It is perfectly true that the disposition of corpus on marriage cannot be quite appropriately described as a gift over, which was the case in In re Mason,[16] but I do not regard that nicety of distinction as decisive in this matter. The true principle is to be found in the passage I have read from the judgment of Buckley L.J. There is a disposition of income for a time and that is followed by a disposition of corpus. I therefore do not regard the decision in Rishton v. Cobb [17] as binding on me and, for the reasons I have given, as Margaret Mussett never did marry, in my judgment corpus is not disposed of by the will.

In these circumstances, I think that it is unnecessary for me to come to any conclusion on the second point that was argued before me, a point of some interest, which was whether the direction to settle could be treated as a direction to settle on the marriage settlement trusts or whether it was virtually a gift of corpus to her on marriage. The cardinal fact remains that the testator was intending to dispose of capital on marriage, and that distinguishes, in my judgment, Rishton v. Cobb.[18]

I therefore propose to declare that the legacy fell into residue.

Road Traffic — Insurance — Motor-cycle — Sidecar "permanently attached"—Sidecar body removed—Chassis and wheel still attached — Insurance company admittedly "on risk" — Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), Part II and s. 35 (1).

A motor-cyclist who held a cover note for third party insurance limited to a motor-cycle "with sidecar permanently attached," removed the body of the sidecar leaving only its chassis and wheel attached to the motor-cycle. The insurance company accepted that in those circumstances they were "on risk":—

Held, that inasmuch as the insurance company admitted that the chassis and wheel of the sidecar constituted a sidecar within the meaning of the cover note issued by them, and as that was a possible construction, the assured was insured against third party risks for the purpose of section 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

CASE STATED by the City of Sheffield justices.

An information was laid by the appellant, Mr. George Alfred Carnill, a superintendent of police, against the respondent, Mr. Tom Rowland, alleging that on July 17, 1952 "he . . . did "use on a road a motor-cycle . . . there not being in force in "relation to the user of the vehicle such a policy of insurance ". . . . in respect of third party risks as complied with the "requirements of Part II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary "to section 35 (1) of the Act." [1]

At the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted. On July 11, 1952, the respondent signed a proposal form for the insurance of a motor-cycle combination by the Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd. By the terms of the proposal form the policy was to be restricted to the use of a motor-cycle to which a sidecar or box-carrier was permanently attached. On July 14, 1952, a cover note was issued to the respondent by the insurance company with the words "Exclusion "and special conditions—Sidecar permanently attached." The form of certificate of insurance which would have been issued in due course would have contained the words "Use of the cycle is "only permitted when a sidecar or box-carrier is attached."

On July 17, 1952, the respondent, having removed the sidecar body from the motor-cycle, drove the vehicle on a road in Sheffield, there being attached to the motor-cycle at that time only the sidecar chassis and the wheel.

[1] Road Traffic Act, 1930, Part II, s. 35 (1): ". . . it shall not be lawful "for any person to use . . . a motor-"vehicle on a road unless there is in "force in relation to the user of the "vehicle . . . such a policy of insur-"ance . . . in respect of third-party "risks as complies with the require-"ments of this part of this Act."

[Reported by Mrs. E. M. WELLWOOD, Barrister-at-Law.]

CARNILL v. ROWLAND.

On behalf of the prosecution it was contended that the special condition in the cover note that a sidecar must be permanently attached was a condition which circumscribed the operation of the policy from the beginning, and that there was therefore no policy of insurance in force in relation to the use of the vehicle by the respondent when it was used without a sidecar permanently attached; that no sidecar was attached to the vehicle when used on July 17, 1952; that the test whether the policy of insurance was in force was not whether the insurance company considered itself "on risk," but whether it was in law liable to indemnify the user if damage and injury had resulted from the use of the vehicle at a time when no sidecar was permanently attached.

On the part of the respondent it was contended, inter alia, that it was within the contemplation of the respondent and the insurance company at the time when the insurance was effected that the vehicle could be used without a body being attached to the sidecar, and that the policy was not vitiated in any way by the removal of the sidecar body.

A representative of the Co-operative Insurance Society gave evidence before the justices that the insurance company for the purposes of the policy of insurance regarded what was attached at the material time as a sidecar.

The justices, being of opinion that the respondent's use of the vehicle was covered by insurance against third party risks, dismissed the information.

The prosecutor appealed.

P. Wrightson for the appellant.

LORD GODDARD C.J. I do not think that this is a case of any general importance, for all these cases must depend on their particular facts. Because in this particular case the justices have dismissed the charge and because this court upholds their decision, it does not follow that where the facts are nearly the same and there is some different insurance policy, or another company is involved, that the decision would necessarily be the same.

It has often been pointed out that inconvenience has arisen in cases where a person has been charged with using a motor-car when there was not a policy of insurance in force in relation to it because the cases, which sometimes involved nice questions of insurance law, have had to be decided in the absence of one of the parties most interested, namely, the insurance company. For that reason, it is to be hoped that use will be made of an arrangement which has been come to, with the approval of the appropriate authorities, for consultation between the police and insurance companies on whether or not the insurance companies are "on risk" or consider themselves "on risk." If an insurance company informs the appropriate authority in a particular instance that they consider themselves "on risk," the mischief at which the Act is aimed does not arise because, if an accident took place the company would indemnify, and be liable to indemnify, the respondent so that the injured person would recover the money. On the other hand, the court has to give these decisions in the absence of an insurance company, and if the justices decide, and this court upholds or reverses their decision and gives a decision on the construction of the policy, although that decision may have some persuasive effect, it is in no way binding between the insurance company and the assured. If, for instance, in the present case we decided that the insurance company were not "on risk," although they have said that they were, that would not debar or bind the assured, who is the respondent to this appeal, if he met with an accident and chose to bring an action against his insurers for a declaration that they were bound to indemnify him.

Lord Goddard C.J.

The facts of this particular case are that the respondent made a proposal to the Co-operative Insurance Society Ld. for a policy of insurance, and he was asked: "Do you desire the policy to be "restricted to the use of any motor-cycle to which a sidecar or "box-carrier is permanently attached?" and he answered "Yes." Thereupon a cover note was issued pending the issue of the policy, and the cover note contained the words: "Exclu- "sions and special conditions: sidecar permanently attached," and if the sidecar is not attached presumably liability is thereby excluded, but these exclusions and conditions are put in for the protection of insurance companies. They may take a smaller premium if their risk is limited, and if the insurance company do not wish to rely on an exclusion or say that in their view the exclusion does not arise in any particular case, I do not know why the court should be acute to find that they are wrong, because every policy has to be read contra proferentem. If the insurance company insert exceptions or conditions in the policy, those conditions have to be read against the insurance company so far as it is possible.

In this case a representative of the insurance company was called before the justices, and he told them that the company considered themselves "on risk." That means no more than that they said that for the purposes of the policy of insurance they regarded what was attached to the cycle as a sidecar. Under those circumstances the justices came to the conclusion that the charge was not made out, because they thought that the respondent was insured, and I see no reason to differ from them. For my part, I put it simply on this ground: the insurance company having said that they read the policy as meaning that at the time what was attached to the cycle satisfied the conditions of the policy, I think that there is no reason to say that the respondent was uninsured at the time when he was stopped.

LYNSKEY J. I agree. It is clear that if a condition in a policy is so broad that it has only one meaning, and that meaning is to exclude the insurance company from liability when the machine is used either for certain purposes or in certain conditions, the court is bound by that clause and must act upon it, But if there is a clause in the policy which is open to two constructions, it is for the court to construe that condition contra proferentem, that is, against the insurance company.

The question here was whether this was a motor-cycle which was fitted with a sidecar. What is the meaning of " a sidecar " permanently fixed " may be a question of doubt. According to the evidence before the justices on which they so found, the insurance company itself read the policy as putting them " on " risk " when the cycle was in the condition in which it was found at the time when this offence was alleged to have been committed, namely, fitted with a chassis and a third wheel but with the body of the sidecar temporarily absent. If that was a construction of the meaning of a sidecar which was impossible on the wording of the policy, one would be able to say that the justices had no right so to find, but in fact, it seems to me that the meaning of " passenger-carrying sidecar attached " is open to two constructions. The insurance company took one, which the justices accepted; they accepted the fact that the insurance company was on risk and that the respondent was in fact covered. Under those circumstances, I agree with my Lord that this appeal should be dismissed.

PEARSON J. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. I only want to say that I should agree with the contention of the appellant, set out in the stated case, " That the test whether a " policy of insurance is in force is not whether the insurance " company consider itself on risk, but whether it was in law " liable to indemnify the user if damage and injury had resulted " from the use of the vehicle at a time when no sidecar was " permanently attached." If it was plain that there was no sidecar attached to this vehicle at the material time, then I think that the view of the insurance company that they were bound would be in such circumstances quite manifestly incorrect in law and would have to be disregarded. But here is a case in which it is arguable one way or the other whether there was a sidecar or not attached at the material time. That being so, and it being a very reasonable view that there was still a sidecar attached because the sidecar had not ceased to be a sidecar merely because a part of it had been taken off the machine, I think that it was perfectly in order for the justices to take into account the view expressed by the insurance company as one of the material factors for them to consider. For that reason, I do not think that it is shown that any error was made by the justices in coming to the decision which they did, and I agree with the proposed judgment.

Road Traffic—Licensing—Goods vehicle—Utility van, constructed for carriage of goods, towing caravan—No goods carried in van or caravan—Van licensed as private vehicle—Not used for carriage of goods or burden—Haulage—Carriage—Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 89), ss. 5, 13, 27.

The defendant used a utility van, constructed for the carriage of goods but licensed as a private vehicle, to tow a caravan on a public road. No goods were being carried in either the van or the caravan at the time. The defendant was charged with unlawfully using the van on a public road for a purpose which brought it within a class of vehicles to which a higher rate of duty was chargeable, such higher rate of duty not having been paid, contrary to section 13 of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949. The justices considered that the van was not a "goods vehicle" within section 27 of the Act and dismissed the charge. On appeal by the prosecutor:—

Held, that the van was not being used for the carriage of goods or burden and was not therefore a "goods vehicle" within the meaning of section 27. The Act was concerned primarily with haulage as opposed to carriage, and, had the caravan been laden with goods, it seemed that the van would have been used to convey the goods, but in the absence of clear and precise words in the Act showing that it was intended that the van, as being used at the material time, should be subject to a higher rate of tax, and in view of the vagueness and uncertainty of the matter, it could not be said that the justices were wrong.

Cook v. Hobbs [1911] 1 K.B. 14 followed.

CASE STATED by Lincolnshire justices.

An information was preferred against the defendant, Donald Boyes, for that he, on July 15, 1952, while there was in force a certain licence taken out for a mechanically propelled vehicle, namely, a Bedford utility van, at a certain rate under the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, unlawfully used the vehicle on a public road for a purpose which brought it within a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was chargeable, such higher rate not having been paid before the vehicle was so used, contrary to section 13 [1] of the Act.

At the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted. The defendant was a towing contractor and was at the material date the owner of a Bedford utility van constructed or adapted for the conveyance of goods. On July 15, 1952, the defendant used the vehicle on a public road for the purpose of towing a caravan, but no goods were at the time being carried in either the vehicle or the caravan. The vehicle was licensed as a private vehicle, duty having been paid at the rate of £10 per annum, but if it had been licensed as a goods vehicle duty would have been chargeable at the rate of £27 10s. 0d. per annum, and an additional duty at the rate of £10 per annum would have been chargeable in respect of the use of the vehicle for towing a trailer.

On behalf of the prosecutor it was contended that, as the vehicle was constructed for the conveyance of goods, and was drawing a caravan, it was a "goods vehicle" within the meaning of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949.

On behalf of the defendant it was contended that the vehicle was not used for the conveyance of goods and was properly licensed as a private vehicle notwithstanding that it was towing a caravan.

The justices were of the opinion that the vehicle was not a "goods vehicle" within the definition in section 27 [2] of the Act, as there was no evidence that it was being used for the conveyance of goods; they were also of the opinion that it was properly licensed as a private vehicle and could lawfully draw a caravan without further duty being chargeable, and they dismissed the information.

The prosecutor appealed.

PEARSON v. BOYES.

J. P. Ashworth for the prosecutor.

The defendant did not appear and was not represented.

The following cases were referred to in argument: James v. Davies [3]; Carrimore Six Wheelers Ld. v. Arnold [4]; Cook v. Hobbs [5]; Manning v. Hammond [6]; Speak v. Powell [7]; Foster v. Great Eastern Railway Co. [8]

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices, before whom the respondent, a towing contractor, was charged with using a vehicle on a public road "for a purpose which brought "it within a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate "of duty was chargeable, such higher rate not having been paid "before the vehicle was so used, contrary to section 13 of the "Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949."

The case turns upon the fact that the vehicle, a utility van, which could be used for the carriage of goods, was at the time in question towing an unladen caravan. Section 27, the interpretation section, of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, provides: "'Goods vehicle' means a mechanically propelled vehicle "(including a tricycle weighing more than 8 cwts. unladen) "constructed or adapted for use and used for the conveyance of "goods or burden of any description, whether in the course of "trade or otherwise." The question is: if this vehicle was constructed as a goods vehicle, was it being used for the conveyance of goods or burden of any description?

The Act deals with different varieties of vehicles and different occasions, and is concerned primarily with the haulage of vehicles or vehicles used for haulage, and it refers to tractors, goods vehicles and the like. A very interesting argument was addressed to us and Mr. Ashworth referred to a considerable number of authorities in an attempt to elucidate this point. For myself, I should be content to decide this case very much on the same lines as this court decided Cook v. Hobbs [1]; if it is desired to tax these vehicles they should be taxed in clear words. A subject is only to be taxed if the taxing authority can show that there is no question about it that he is taxed, and if it is necessary to hunt about through a large number of sections and consider a large number of cases it seems to me to show that the legislature has not used clear and precise words showing that a tax is to be imposed.

In my opinion, taking into consideration the whole scheme of the Act and the words of the different sections and the expressions used, I think that the Act is concerned with haulage as something quite distinct from carriage. If a utility van were used with a trailer which was laden with goods, it would seem to me that it would be being used for the conveyance of goods because, although the goods were put into the trailer attached to the van, it would be the van which would be conveying the goods from point to point. It might be said, of course, from one point of view, that it was conveying a caravan, but what it would actually be doing would be towing an empty caravan. As the Act seems to differentiate between haulage and towage, which are the same things, and carriage, and because the whole matter is left so vague and debatable, I cannot see here that the justices were wrong, or that Parliament intended to tax this vehicle in the way suggested.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Persistent cruelty—Allegations of sodomy—Questions of corroboration and acquiescence—Justices' reasons—Necessity to state precise nature of findings.

When justices have made a finding of persistent cruelty in a case where there have been allegations of sodomy and of other abnormal practices they should state in clear terms what precisely they have found, and not say merely that there have been abnormal sexual practices. If they find sodomy, they should say so.

In a case where sodomy has been alleged the court must in accordance with the authorities direct itself on the desirability, though not the necessity, of corroboration; and if sodomy be found after such a direction, must then consider the possibility of acquiescence. If the justices have properly directed themselves upon the questions of corroboration and acquiescence, they should refer to these matters in the reasons given for their decision.

There cannot be a true assent to acts of sodomy if such acts are forced upon a wife either literally or by some fraudulent persuasion that such an act is only one of the normal incidents of married life.

APPEAL from justices.

The parties were married in 1949, when the husband was 22 and the wife 18, and they lived together until the summer of

1953

DAVIDSON v. DAVIDSON.

1952. On August 20, 1952, the wife issued a summons alleging persistent cruelty, and an order was made on that ground under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895–1950, on September 16, 1952.

The husband appealed. The justices' reasons and the facts are given in the judgment of Karminski J.

Geoffrey Crispin for the husband.
Stranger-Jones for the wife.

The cases referred to in the judgment of Karminski J. were cited in argument.

COLLINGWOOD J. I will ask my brother to deliver the judgment.

KARMINSKI J. The summons was, in form, one alleging persistent cruelty, but, as shown at the hearing, the evidence was largely, but by no means entirely, directed to sodomy. There was an allegation put in cross-examination to the husband, though not spoken to by the wife, that on one occasion or more than one occasion he had sought sexual intercourse per oram. He denied it, and presumably the justices were bound to accept his denial, since there was no evidence the other way. There were also certain allegations, not in my view very serious in their nature, of blows; and though it was common ground that at any rate on one occasion, and probably more, the husband had struck the wife by slapping her, the only serious allegation was that in a quarrel at a dance on New Year's Eve, outside the six months preceding the summons, he had struck her, possibly not without provocation, sufficiently hard to cut her mouth. There was one incident which was dealt with in evidence, but not expressly found to be proved, though to some extent corroborated, that on one occasion within the six months the husband, in the presence of another couple who were neighbours, put his hand up his wife's clothing underneath her skirt. It is not clear whether that was relied on as an act of cruelty of itself or in some way intended to corroborate the charge of sodomy.

The wife gave evidence that the husband had committed a number of acts of sodomy upon her, and she said that she consented; she was only a very young woman, and she alleged that the husband persuaded her that it was normal sexual intercourse, or at any rate a kind of normal sexual intercourse, and that it was only when she discovered that it was not normal that she refused to allow him to do it further. No corroboration was given of the wife's complaints, nor, indeed, does it appear that she ever made a complaint to anybody about the husband's sexual conduct in this respect.

The marriage was apparently broken up by a quarrel over the husband's brother staying with them. It is not necessary to go into detail on this matter, but it is the fact that the wife objected to the brother's presence in their hut, and a quarrel developed which resulted in the wife leaving and apparently being kept out thereafter by the husband; though he seems to have repented of his action later and to have consulted the probation officer. But be that as it may, it seems to me that the whole gravamen of the wife's complaints was the allegation of sodomy. The matter was gone into quite thoroughly, and the husband gave evidence emphatically denying that he had ever committed sodomy upon his wife.

There is one other matter which should, at any rate, be touched on. It is clear that both the husband and the wife committed adultery during this short marriage, and I say no more about it than this, that it is at least arguable on the facts at present known to us that each connived in the clearest possible way at the adultery of the other, and that now, therefore, neither is at liberty to complain of the other's adultery. It must not be thought that this court is making any finding on that matter, but on the facts before us I am bound to say that at any rate there is a good deal of evidence to support the possibility of connivance on both sides.

The case was fully investigated as to the facts by the justices, and at the end they found that the cruelty was proved. It now becomes necessary to consider the reasons they gave for their findings, which, I am bound to say, are in my view wholly unsatisfactory and unconvincing. I do not desire to say more than is necessary, because in the view which I have been able to form of this case it is clearly one in which the issues between the parties have not yet been properly or fully tried, and therefore, must be retried.

The justices in their findings rightly said that it was an unusual case, " and for that reason gave special attention to the appear- " ance and demeanour of the parties," and with that finding, having regard to their mutual adultery, nobody can quarrel. They also emphasized that the wife at the time of the marriage was only 18 years of age. They then said: " While the wife was not " entirely blameless regarding the events starting at Christmas, " 1950, she was to a large extent influenced by what she believed " about her husband's health." I am not quite sure what, if anything, that means, but there was some evidence that the husband had been in hospital, the wife suggested for some neurosis. They then found this, and it is a most important finding: " There had been abnormal sexual practices, although " these had ceased some few months before the final break-up." I emphasize the phraseology " abnormal sexual practices," and I will content myself with observing only this, that if justices are finding something of this nature they should say what precisely they have found in clear terms.

Sodomy, of course, is a matrimonial offence as well as a criminal one, and it is a very serious offence. If they were finding other sexual practices it was, I think, desirable that they should state the precise nature of the offences which they found. In this case that has some special significance, because of the question put to the husband in cross-examination on sexual intercourse per oram. We were invited by Mr. Stranger-Jones to say that the finding of abnormal practices meant sodomy and nothing else, but I am quite unable to accept that argument. If they were finding sodomy they should have said so.

DAVIDSON v. DAVIDSON.

Karminski J.

The justices then went on to accept the wife's evidence of the blow at the dance, which I have already mentioned, and I see no reason why, on the evidence, they should not have accepted it, though apparently they did not deal, as they might have done with the husband's admission of that blow and its mitigation by the wife's conduct, which he said amounted to provocation.

They then dealt in a somewhat mysterious way with the complaint, which was corroborated, that the husband on one occasion put his hand up his wife's clothing, and they said: "There was "corroboration of the indecent incident when the husband put "his hand up his wife's clothes in front of [the two neigh- "bours]." That was, of course, true. I do not know whether by that they meant to find any sort of corroboration of the husband's sodomy; but if they did I cannot accept their reasoning. An incident of that kind may amount to bad manners, maybe to very indecent conduct, but it does not seem to have anything to do with abnormal sexual practices.

They then found that the husband was a conceited and overpowering individual, "who had little regard for the truth, and "one who, while setting himself up as a public benefactor (in "a perverted sense) for women, did his best to throw his wife "into the company of other men." It is clear from that that they did not like the appellant husband, and maybe they were justified in not liking his manner and demeanour; but they did not say, nor do I think that they could have said, that that finding helped in any way towards finding abnormal sexual practices in general, or sodomy in particular.

Lastly they said that "no wife could tolerate such conditions "without her health being seriously affected." What conditions they were referring to I do not know, and I do not propose to speculate.

We are told that the justices had their attention drawn to the well-known case of Statham v. Statham,[1] where it was pointed out that it was necessary for a jury to be directed, or a court to direct itself, on the desirability, though not the necessity, of corroboration in cases of this kind. If the justices were so warned, it is a matter of great regret that they did not refer to the question of corroboration in their reasons. It is, of course, always open to any court to find a charge of this kind proved without corroboration, but it must first warn itself of the dangers of so doing. In a case in this court reported as D. B. v. W. B.,[2] and, therefore, a case decided some years after Statham v. Statham,[1] the principles to be applied in cases of sodomy and sexual perversion were fully argued by experienced counsel. The President dealt with the matter, if I may respectfully say so, in the clearest possible terms, in these words[3]:—"The court "demands that when a matrimonial offence, whatever it is, is "charged, if possible the evidence of the spouse making the "charge should be corroborated, and not least with regard to "matters of the sort charged in this case about which, if there "was not a reasonably strict rule in this respect, one spouse "would be so easily at the mercy of the other in relation to things "which from their nature must happen in private. But when "that has been said it is admitted that the necessity for cor-"roboration is not an absolute rule of law. Justices should "direct themselves, just as a judge should direct a jury, that it "is safer to have corroboration, if possible; but when that "warning has been given and given in the fullest form, then "there is no rule of law which prevents the tribunal finding the "matter proved in the absence of corroboration."

The matter before the justices, and before this court, in D. B. v. W. B.,[4] were allegations of perverted sexual intercourse; and that direction I must follow, of course, in any event. I am far from satisfied that the justices, if their attention was called to Statham v. Statham,[5] either understood it or directed themselves properly according to that decision. It is clear in this case, as so often happens in cases either of sodomy or perversion, that there can be no corroboration, but it also must be remembered that no kind of charge can be made more easily by a wife, nor is there one which is more difficult for a husband to answer.

There remains, even if the justices did direct themselves properly as to the desirability of corroboration, this aspect of the matter: even if they were right in finding sodomy after a proper direction to themselves, they do not seem to have considered at all the question which must arise in charges of this kind of acquiescence by the complaining wife, and as Sir Boyd Merriman P. pointed out in D. B. v. W. B.,[6] referring to Statham v. Statham,[7] "If the conduct charged against the "husband is a thing which could prima facie only have happened "with the assent of the wife there must be some corroboration; "and she ought not to be able to come to the court and complain "of something to which she herself has consented. Whichever "way it is put, it is plain that the closest scrutiny ought to be "given by justices to an allegation of cruelty which at the end

DAVIDSON v. DAVIDSON.

" of it all is based upon filthy acts of this sort which cannot have " occurred without at least the assent of the wife." Pausing there for a moment, it is, of course, true that the assent of a wife, especially a young wife, cannot be true assent if the acts are forced upon her, either literally by overwhelming force or by some fraudulent persuasion that it was all right and only one of the normal incidents of married life. But that aspect of acquiescence, which in my view is vital in these cases, does not seem to have been considered by the justices at all. At any rate, the matter is not mentioned in their findings.

I have gone into the questions of corroboration and acquiescence in the hope that it may be of some possible assistance to the justices who will have to retry this matter. These cases are inevitably difficult, whether for justices or for higher tribunals, and I have referred to Statham v. Statham [7] and D. B. v. W. B. [8] in the hope that the justices' attention may be called to the requisites to be proved and to the dangers to be avoided in cases of this kind.

I have no doubt whatsoever that the trial by the justices which resulted in this order was completely unsatisfactory, and in my view there must be a new trial before a fresh panel of justices.

COLLINGWOOD J. I agree, and as we are sending this case back for retrial by a fresh panel of justices I propose to add nothing to what my Lord has said.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Witness for defence called after summing-up.

Although a practice not to be encouraged, it is permissible, if the circumstances warrant it, for a witness for the defence to be called after the summing-up, and for the judge to add to his summing-up thereafter.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against conviction.

The applicant, Andrew John Sanderson, was convicted at the Central Criminal Court of wounding with intent and assault, and was sentenced to three years' and 18 months' imprisonment respectively to run consecutively.

The applicant did not appear and was not represented.

REGINA v. SANDERSON.

PEARSON J. delivered the following judgment of the court:— In this case the application is refused, but the case has a peculiar feature in that a witness, whom the defence desired to call, did not arrive until a very late stage when the summing-up had been almost completed. After the summing-up, an application was made on the part of the defence that that witness should be called, and that application was acceded to. The recorder then delivered a short supplementary summing-up with reference to the evidence of that witness.

In Reg. v. Owen [1] it was held that it was wrong for witnesses to be called for the prosecution after the summing-up, but we think that the present case is distinguishable from that case because here extra liberty was extended to the defence. It is not a matter one would wish to happen very often but, on the particular facts, which have been carefully considered, we think that there is no objection to be taken to what was done and that the recorder was fully justified in the rather unusual course which he took.

Application refused.

Feb. 4, 5.

Lord Goddard C.J., Lynskey and Pearson JJ.

Local Government—Sewage—Trade Effluent—Discharge into sewer—Consent of local authority—Additional premises acquired—Effluent therefrom blended with and discharged with that from old premises—No alteration in character, volume or rate of discharge—Consent not obtained—Offence—Public Health (Drainage of Trade Premises) Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 40), ss. 2 (1) (2), 4 (1), 14 (1).

Before 1937 a company occupied a dye works from which, with the consent of the local authority, they discharged a trade effluent into the local authority's sewer. In 1946 the company acquired adjoining premises which had been a foundry, and made them part of their works as a new dye house in which a trade effluent was produced in addition to the effluent produced on the old premises. The effluent from the new premises was carried to the old premises where it was blended with the effluent there produced and the blended effluent was discharged into the sewer from the old premises. The quantity so discharged did not exceed the quantity discharged from the old premises on any one day during the year ending March 3, 1937, and the rate of discharge was not higher than the old rate.

The company were convicted before a court of summary jurisdiction of contravening the provisions of section 2 (1) of the Public Health (Drainage of Trade Premises) Act, 1937, and their appeal to quarter sessions was dismissed. They appealed to the Divisional Court:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the trade effluent now being discharged into the sewer was not produced at the same premises as those in which the effluent was produced before March 3, 1937, since it was now the effluent of two premises and not of one set of premises. It was impossible to say that the effluent now being produced in the new premises was not discharged into the sewer, although the discharge was being effected indirectly; and, as no consent to the discharge had been given by the local authority, the company were guilty of the offence charged.

CASE STATED by Lancaster Quarter Sessions.

On June 20, 1952, the Yorkshire Dyeing and Proofing Co. Ld. appealed to quarter sessions against their conviction before a court of summary jurisdiction on two informations preferred against them by the town clerk of the Middleton Borough Council. The convictions were on informations charging (1) that they (the company) on July 25, 1951, were the occupiers of certain trade premises situate at Spring Vale, Middleton, from which premises a certain trade effluent was discharged into a public sewer of the council of the Borough of Middleton, the local authority, in contravention of section 2 of the Public Health (Drainage of Trade Premises) Act, 1937[1] no trade effluent notice

[1] Public Health (Drainage of Trade Premises) Act, 1937, s. 2 (1): "No "trade effluent shall be discharged "from any trade premises into a "public sewer of a local authority "otherwise than in accordance with "a written notice (hereafter in this "Act referred to as 'a trade effluent "notice') served on the local autho- "rity by the owner or occupier of the "premises, stating—(a) the nature or "composition of the trade effluent, "(b) the maximum quantity of the "trade effluent which it is proposed "to discharge on any one day, and "(c) the highest rate at which it "is proposed to discharge the trade "effluent; . . ."

Subs. (2): "In so far as the "discharge of any trade effluent in "accordance with a trade effluent "notice would not be lawful without "the consent of the local authority, "the notice shall be deemed to be an "application for that consent."

S. 4 (1): "For the purposes of this "Act the consent of a local authority "to the discharge of any trade effluent "from any trade premises into a sewer "of the local authority shall not be "necessary, if any trade effluent of "the same nature or composition as "that of the trade effluent in question "was lawfully discharged as aforesaid "from those premises into that sewer "at some time within the period of "one year ending on March 3, 1937, "and if and so long as—(a) the quan- "tity of the trade effluent discharged "from the premises into the sewer on "any one day does not exceed the "maximum quantity thereof so dis- "charged on any one day during the "said period, and (b) the rate at "which the trade effluent is discharged "from the premises into the sewer is "not higher than the highest rate at "which it was so discharged during "the said period, . . ."

S. 14 (1): ". . . 'trade effluent' "means any liquid either with or with- "out particles of matter in suspension "therein, which is wholly or in part "produced in the course of any trade "or industry carried on at trade pre- "mises, and, in relation to any trade "premises, means any such liquid as "aforesaid which is so produced in "the course of any trade or industry "carried on at those premises but does "not include domestic sewage; . . ."

having been served on the local authority, and (2) that the effluent was so discharged without the consent of the local authority.

At the hearing before quarter sessions the following facts were proved or admitted: For many years before 1936, and in particular during the period of one year ending on March 3, 1937, the company had lawfully discharged into a public sewer of the council a trade effluent wholly produced in a portion of their trade premises which they then occupied. The discharge in question was by means of two pipes which left the premises at two defined points. In 1946 the company extended their premises by adding a new portion which was not within the company's curtilage nor within their occupation or ownership during the year ending March 3, 1937, but was the site of entirely separate premises, then known as Campbell's Foundry.

The new premises had direct internal communication with the original premises of the company. The company moved part of their machinery from their old premises into the new, but the total amount of plant and machinery in the two parts was not increased or altered.

At all material times, and in particular on July 25, 1951, all the trade effluent produced in the new premises passed into the old premises where it was joined by and blended with an equal quantity of trade effluent wholly produced in the old premises. At all material times the trade effluent blended, as stated, passed into the public sewer through the same pipes as those in use before the new premises were acquired. The blended effluent was of the same nature and composition as that which had been discharged from the old premises within the period of one year ending on March 3, 1937, and the quantity of the blended trade effluent discharged on any one day did not exceed the maximum quantity lawfully discharged on any one day during the period, and the rate at which the blended effluent was discharged was never higher than the highest rate at which trade effluent was lawfully discharged during the period.

Before the discharge of the blended effluent on July 25, 1951, the company had not served on the local authority a trade effluent notice nor had they obtained the consent of the local authority to the discharge of the blended effluent on July 25, 1951, or to the discharge of any effluent produced in the new premises. No by-laws had been made by the council under the Act.

It was contended on behalf of the company (1) that having regard to the definition of "trade effluent" and of trade effluent "in relation to any trade premises" in section 14 (1) of the Act, the trade effluent discharged on July 25, 1951, was produced in part in the course of trade or industry carried on in the old premises, and that the discharge into the public sewer was from the old premises, and not the new, and that, therefore, by the provisions of section 4 (1) of the Act, no trade effluent notice or consent of the local authority was required and that, consequently no offence had been committed; and (2) that, in any event, the new premises were part of the premises from which trade effluent of the same nature and composition as that which formed the subject-matter of the informations had been lawfully discharged into the sewer during the period of one year ending in March, 1937, and that the provisos of section 4 (1) having been complied with, for that reason also no trade effluent notice or consent of the local authority was necessary, and that no offence had been committed.

It was contended for the council (1) that the passage of trade effluent from the new premises into the sewer was a discharge of a trade effluent into a public sewer, and that no trade effluent had been discharged into that sewer from those premises at any time within the period of one year ending on March 3, 1937; (2) that the new premises were not part of the premises from which trade effluent of the same nature and composition as that which was the subject of the informations had been lawfully discharged during the year ending March 3, 1937; and (3) that it was unlawful to discharge trade effluent from the new premises without serving a trade effluent notice or obtaining the consent of the local authority in respect of such discharge.

The appeal committee of quarter sessions decided by a majority that the appeal should be dismissed on the ground that they considered that the new and the old premises did not constitute the same premises. The argument for the company that the trade effluent was wholly or partially discharged from the old premises, and so relieved the company from giving notice or obtaining authority, was not accepted by quarter sessions. They accordingly upheld the decision of the court of summary jurisdiction.

Harold Willis Q.C. and C. T. B. Leigh for the company.
Kenneth Diplock Q.C. and J. D. Cantley for the council.

No cases were cited during the arguments.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by the Appeal Committee of the Quarter Sessions for the County of Lancaster, before whom the Yorkshire Dyeing and Proofing Co. Ld. appealed against two convictions by justices in petty sessions. The first conviction was: "For that they on July 25, 1951, were the "occupiers of certain trade premises situate at Spring Vale, "Middleton, from which premises a certain trade effluent was "discharged into a public sewer of the Council of the Borough "of Middleton, the local authority, in contravention of section 2 "of the Public Health (Drainage and Trade Premises) Act, 1937, "no trade effluent notice having been served."

The second conviction was on the same facts except that the offence was discharging the effluent without the consent of the local authority. The appeal committee dismissed the appeals subject to the case which they have stated.

YORKSHIRE DYEING AND PROOFING CO. LD. v. MIDDLETON BOROUGH COUNCIL.

Very briefly, the facts are these: for many years before 1937 the appellants occupied a dye works at Middleton and discharged their trade effluent into the local authority's sewer. In 1946 they acquired adjoining premises. They were not originally their premises; they were a foundry. They acquired those premises and made them part of their works. The new premises formed a substantial addition to the original premises. They were not within the original curtilage or in the original ownership of the firm.

Having acquired the premises, the appellants transferred part of their dye works to the new premises, which were described on the plan as a new dye house, and in that dye house a certain trade effluent was produced. Since their acquisition of the new premises there was also a trade effluent produced in the former dye works which existed before 1946, and the trade effluent from the new dye house and the old dye house merges or blends actually on the old premises, and therefore the discharge into the sewer still takes place from the old premises, but it includes not only the effluent from the old premises but also the effluent from the new premises.

The question for decision depends principally on section 4 (1) of the Public Health (Drainage of Trade Premises) Act, 1937, and section 14, the definition section. The Act is intended to prohibit the discharge of trade effluent into the sewers of local authorities except with their consent, which has to be applied for in a certain manner by serving notice; and if consent is required and is given, the local authority are entitled to impose conditions. The Act, however, by section 4 (1), exempts from its provisions the discharge of trade effluent which was lawfully discharged at some time within the period of one year ending on March 3, 1937, but the exemption is hedged around with certain conditions, and it is therefore just as well to read it. [His Lordship read section 4 (1) and continued:] Quarter sessions have found that the composition of the blended trade effluent is the same; that the quantity does not exceed the maximum quantity previously discharged, and that the rate at which it is discharged is not higher than the rate at which it was discharged down to March 3, 1937. It may be said that it would appear as though the merits of this case were with the appellants, or at any rate that it is not easy to see why, as they are not discharging any more or different effluent into the sewer than they did before 1937, the local authority should object, but what we have to consider is whether or not this case comes within the exemption. If it does not, then the offence has been committed although, as I have said, it would appear that the merits are not conspicuously against the appellants.

The definition of trade effluent in section 14 of the Act, which has given rise to a good deal of discussion, is: "'Trade

YORKSHIRE DYEING AND PROOFING CO. LD. v. MIDDLETON BOROUGH COUNCIL.

Lord Goddard C.J.

"effluent" means any liquid, either with or without particles "of matter in suspension therein, which is wholly or in part "produced in the course of any trade or industry carried on "at trade premises, and, in relation to any trade premises, "means any such liquid as aforesaid which is so produced in "the course of any trade or industry carried on at those premises, "but does not include domestic sewage." For my part, I think that the words "wholly or in part" relate to the composition or constitution of the trade effluent, and that "trade effluent" for the present purpose means a fluid which is partly composed, or may be partly composed, of the product of the trade or business and of something else which in the ordinary course would be water. It is not to be said, therefore, that the effluent is not a trade effluent because part of it is water. It must be wholly or in part produced in the course of the business carried on at trade premises, and in relation to any trade premises it means any liquid which is wholly or in part produced in the course of a trade or industry carried on at those premises.

I agree with the view taken by quarter sessions that the whole question really depends on whether or not the trade effluent which is now going into the local authority's sewer is produced at the same premises as those at which it was produced before March, 1937. Quarter sessions have taken the view that it is not, because it is now the effluent of two premises and not the effluent of one set of premises. They have held, and I think rightly held, that the old foundry which has now become the new dye house is not a part of the old premises, they are separate and new premises, and it seems to me impossible to say that the trade effluent which is being produced in the new dye house is not being discharged into the local authority's sewer. It is true that it passes through the old premises and that it mingles there with the effluent which is produced in the old premises, but none the less it seems to me that the effluent produced is being produced in the new premises and is being discharged from the old premises into the sewer.

For these reasons, though I rather regret it, I feel bound to say that I think that quarter sessions came to a right decision, and this appeal therefore fails. It may be that if the local authority seek to impose conditions, the appellants will have a right of appeal to the Minister, but what view he would take of it is not a matter for us.

LYNSKEY J. I agree. Under the Public Health Act of 1936, which is referred to in the Act of 1937, which we are considering, as the principal Act, there was a complete prohibition against the discharge either directly or indirectly of trade effluent into the public sewers. But by the Act of 1937 provision was made to enable such effluent to be discharged subject to certain notices being given and to the consent of the local authority being obtained, and subject to the right of appeal to the Minister.

Section 2 (5) provides that: "If, in the case of any trade "premises—(a) any trade effluent is discharged in contravention "of this section, or without such consent (if any) as is necessary "for the purposes of this Act, or (b) any direction or condition "given or imposed under this section is contravened, the occupier "of the premises shall be guilty of an offence." On the face of the Act, the owners of trade premises are prohibited from discharging effluent into the sewers. [LYNSKEY J. referred to the facts and continued:]

The first point that arises is: was what took place a discharge of the effluent from the new premises into the sewer? It has been suggested on behalf of the appellants that "discharge" must mean direct discharge. In my view, having regard to the wording of the Act of 1936, to the object of the Act of 1937 and to the results which would follow if one narrowed the discharge to meaning direct discharge, I take the view that "discharge" here means discharge directly or indirectly into the sewer. The result of that, on the finding of quarter sessions, is that the trade effluent from the new premises is discharged into this sewer. Those premises were not in use for their present purpose in 1937, and in that year there was no discharge of effluent from them into the sewer.

The result is that on the wording of the Act, the new premises being found by quarter sessions to be different premises from the old premises, there was a discharge of effluent from the new premises into the sewer and those new premises cannot by themselves be brought within the provisions of the exemption in section 4. Prima facie, that was clearly an offence, but it was suggested by the appellants that the effect of section 4 (1) of the Act was to enable them to carry the effluent from the new premises through their old premises and discharge it into the sewer because the total effluent discharged from the two lots of premises did not exceed either in quantity, in rate of discharge or in its constituents, the effluent which was discharged in 1937.

The whole matter really seems to me to turn upon the interpretation of section 4 (1) and the definition of trade effluent in section 14. The definition there is "any liquid, either with "or without particles of matter in suspension therein, which is "wholly or in part produced in the course of any trade or "industry carried on at trade premises." That is the definition of "trade effluent," an effluent in part produced by the trade operation and in part coming from other sources. Then the definition goes on: "and, in relation to any trade premises, "means any such liquid as aforesaid which is so produced in the "course of any trade or industry carried on at those premises." In my view, the object of the second part of the definition was to restrict the trade effluent to the particular premises upon which the trade was carried on, and it would not bear the construction that it would allow the effluent from other premises, which were not covered by section 4 (1), to be discharged under the umbrella of the exemption which the old premises had acquired under section 4 (1).

In those circumstances, I take the view that quarter sessions were right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

PEARSON J. I agree. I think that the first question is whether one should regard the old and the new premises as one aggregate or as two separate sets of premises for the present purpose. I do not think that it would be right to treat them as one aggregate having regard to their previous history and to the extent of the new portion and, in particular, to what has been found by quarter sessions here. In any case, if it were right to treat them as one aggregate, in my view they would clearly be different premises from those which were occupied by the appellants in 1937. If it were right to treat them as one aggregate, as they were different premises from anything that existed in 1937, section 4 (1), which confers the exemption, which the appellants then enjoyed, would have no application at all, and that would put the appellants here in the worst possible position. But let it be assumed that the new and the old premises constitute two separate premises, which is the way in which quarter sessions approached this question, then one has to consider two problems: first, is the direct discharge of the effluent in question from the old premises into the sewer covered by the provisions of section 4 (1)?; and—secondly, a separate question—is the indirect discharge of the effluent from the new premises through the old premises also covered by section 4 (1)?

As to the first question, namely, whether the direct discharge from the old premises is wholly covered by section 4 (1), I should have thought that it was, because that depends upon what is the exact meaning of the second part of the definition of "trade "effluent" in section 14. As I read the second part of that definition, when one makes the necessary substitutions for the words "such liquid as aforesaid" and the word "so," I think it comes to this: "Trade effluent in relation to any trade premises "means any liquid with or without particles of matter in suspen- "sion therein, which is wholly or in part produced in the course "of any trade or industry carried on at trade premises." It seems to me that the word "so" must be regarded as incorporating the words "wholly or in part." Then, one must read as a whole the words which follow, "In the course of any trade "or industry carried on at those premises." It seems to me that that requirement is satisfied as regards the old premises, because the effluent which is discharged from there into the local authority's sewer is in part liquid of the kind described, produced in the course of a trade or industry carried on in the old premises, and it does not prevent the application of that definition that some part of what is discharged has with it some other part which is discharged from different premises. It would not matter whether the premises were in the occupation of the same or a different company. I think that part of the definition read literally, which it should be unless it produces an impossible conclusion, would have that result, and therefore the appellants are innocent so far as that direct discharge is concerned.

But there is the further question whether section 4 (1) protects them in respect of the indirect discharge from the new premises. There, one has to consider whether the word " discharge " means direct or indirect discharge or is limited only to direct. On that point I entirely agree that it is all-important to look back to section 34 of the Public Health Act, 1936, which imposed an absolute prohibition on the discharge of liquid from a factory into a sewer subject to certain conditions. Section 1 of the Act of 1937 remedies or alters or mitigates that prohibition. Section 34 of the Public Health Act, 1936, uses the words " discharge directly or indirectly " quite plainly. As section 1 of the 1937 Act is introducing a relaxation of that prohibition, I think that the word " discharge " in section 1 of the Act, and therefore throughout the Act, should have the same meaning of directly or indirectly discharge. Also I think that without any limiting words one would naturally read the word " discharge " as meaning directly or indirectly. Therefore, I think it is necessary for the appellants to show some reason or justification for their indirect discharge from the old premises into the sewer and they have not shown it, and they clearly do not come for that purpose within section 4 (1). There was no discharge in the year 1937 or before the year 1937 from the new premises into the sewer, and therefore they have failed to show any right to make that indirect discharge without the consent of the local authority. For that reason, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Statutory Duty—By-laws—London County Council—Regulation of parks and open spaces—Enforceable by penalty—Breach—No cause of action to member of public.

The London County Council By-Laws in relation to their parks, gardens and open spaces are intended for enforcement by the London County Council by way of proceedings for penalties only, as provided in the by-laws, and are not intended to give a cause of action at law to members of the public, either one against another, or, for breach of them, against the London County Council.

Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium Ltd. [1949] A.C. 398; 65 T.L.R. 170; [1949] 1 All E.R. 544 referred to.

ACTION.

An Alsatian dog owned by the defendant was being taken for a walk by the defendant's daughter, aged 13, on Hackney Downs, to which the London County Council By-laws [1] applied. The girl was walking on the grass which was separated from a pathway by a fence, over which the dog had been jumping. At the approach of the plaintiff with her family along the pathway the girl took hold of the dog. She subsequently let it go and it jumped over the fence, causing the plaintiff to fall.

The plaintiff claimed damages for serious personal injuries occasioned by her fall, alleging (1) negligence against the father in allowing his dog to go out with a child of 13, and against the child in respect of her management and control of the dog; and (2) that a breach of by-law 21 [2] of the London County Council By-laws gave the plaintiff a cause of action.

The defendant denied the allegations.

The case is reported only on the second point. With regard to the allegation of negligence, his Lordship, stating that he was not deciding whether an action would lie at common law for negligence such as was alleged, found that on the facts there was no negligence.

[Reported by Miss C. J. ELLIS, Barrister-at-Law.]

The following cases were referred to in argument: Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium Ltd.[3] and Monk v. Warbey.[4]

HILBERY J., having stated the facts and dismissed the claim based on negligence at common law, continued:—Mr. Solley argued subsequently that, on the cases, the London County Council By-Laws did give a cause of action to a member of the public where one of the by-laws was broken, and he referred to and relied on by-law 21. [His Lordship read the by-law and continued:] The principle on which one has to decide whether statutory provisions or regulations made under statutory power are to be construed as giving a cause of action to a member of the public, or to a particular person or class of persons, in the case of a breach, has been considered many times and has recently been restated in the House of Lords in Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium Ltd.[1] by Lord Simonds. I can quote this passage without, I think—though I tear it from the context—falsifying its force: "The only rule which in all circumstances "is valid is that the answer must depend on a consideration of "the whole Act and the circumstances, including the pre-"existing law, in which it was enacted. But that there are "indications which point with more or less force to the one "answer or the other is clear from authorities which, even where "they do not bind, will have great weight with the House," and he considered those matters. Then, having dealt with the force of the argument to be adduced from either the absence of penalty or its presence, Lord Simonds went on to say[2]: "But this "general rule is subject to exceptions. It may be that, though "a specific remedy is provided by the Act, yet the person injured "has a personal right of action in addition. I cannot state that "proposition more happily, or indeed more favourably to the "appellant, than in the words of Lord Kinnear in Black v. Fife "Coal Co. Ltd.[3]: 'If the duty be established, I do not think "'there is any serious question as to the civil liability. There "'is no reasonable ground for maintaining that a proceeding by "'way of penalty is the only remedy allowed by the statute. "'The principle explained by Lord Cairns in Atkinson v. "'Newcastle Waterworks Co.,[4] and by Lord Herschell in "'Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board[5] solves the question. "'We are to consider the scope and purpose of the statute and "'in particular for whose benefit it is intended. Now the object "'of the present statute is plain. It was intended to compel "'mine owners to make due provision for the safety of the men

Hilbery J.

" ' working in their mines, and the persons for whose benefit all " ' these rules are to be enforced are the persons exposed to " ' danger. But when a duty of this kind is imposed for the " ' benefit of particular persons, then arises at common law a " ' correlative right in those persons who may be injured by its " ' contravention.' " In that case Lord Simonds and the other Lords of Appeal held that it was a matter of penalties, and that the obligations imposed by the section of the Act which they were there considering were only enforceable by proceeding for the penalties specified and not by the class of persons who were being dealt with and affected by the provisions of that particular statute.

I have carefully read through all these by-laws, and it appears to me that, under the statute, the London County Council is given power to make enforceable by-laws such as these for the regulation and for the conducting of their parks, gardens and open spaces. I am satisfied that these by-laws are intended for enforcement by the public authority, the London County Council, by way of proceeding for the penalties; they are by-laws to enable them to enforce disciplinary measures on people who go to the parks, gardens and open spaces both for the protection of those parks, gardens and open spaces and the things that are therein either displayed or made available for public use or enjoyment or in the cause of public decency. There is nothing to indicate, in my view, that they are intended to give a cause of action at law to the members of the public, either one against another, or, for breach of them, against the London County Council.

With regard to the particular by-law relied on so strongly, by-law 21, it is to be observed that it is essentially a by-law intended to protect the comfort and convenience of those using the gardens; to save them from annoyance and, at the same time, to require them to control their dogs and animals taken to the open space or park. But it is observable that the same by-law is there to prevent the same dogs from disturbing or injuring or running on any flower bed or injuring any tree, shrub or plant. It is like the rest of them, in other words: a power taken under statutory powers by the London County Council to enable them effectually to control their parks, gardens and open spaces under the penalties which those by-laws provide, and I have no doubt that those by-laws are not intended to give the public a cause of action in the case of the failure of the London County Council to enforce them or the failure of other members of the public to observe them.

Lord Goddard C.J., Jenkins and Morris L.JJ.

Damages—Fatal Accidents Acts—Basis of assessment of loss of income—Leasehold house subject to mortgage as family home—No financial benefit accruing to widow—Widow not required to give credit for equity of redemption in house.

The plaintiff, a widow with four children, claimed damages from the defendants, her deceased husband's employers, in respect of his death in an accident at work. The family lived in a leasehold house mortgaged to a building society. The trial judge, on the basis that the weekly income of the deceased would but for his death have been £12, estimated the notional keep of the deceased at £5 a week, thus assessing the loss to the family at £7 a week. He held further that the plaintiff should give credit of £750 on the estimated value of the house, which passed to her on the deceased's intestacy; and on the claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, he awarded a total lump sum of £3,250, £800 of which he apportioned variously among the children. That total sum was subject to further reduction by the amount—£400 plus funeral expenses—awarded on a claim under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. On appeal by the plaintiff against the amount of the damages only:—

Held, increasing the total award to £6,000 and the apportionment to the children to £1,000, (1) that, on the facts, the estimate of £5 a week to keep one member of a family of six was disproportionately high; and (2) that since the leasehold house remained the family home and represented no financial benefit to the plaintiff, she was not required to give credit for its value.

Decision of Croom-Johnson J. varied.

APPEAL from Croom-Johnson J.

Evan Gwynffryd Heatley, a locomotive driver, was killed on March 30, 1951, in an accident during the course of his employment with the defendants, the Steel Company of Wales Ld. At the time of his death he was 43 years of age, and was earning just under £10 a week, his custom being to retain £1 out of his pay packet for spending money and to hand the rest of his wages to his wife. But for his death, however, he would almost immediately have earned £12 a week. He and his wife and four infant children, whose ages ranged from 17 to 9 years at the time of the accident, lived in a leasehold house, which was mortgaged to a building society, and the interest payments at the rate of £2 4s. 3d. a month were made by his wife. Something over £250 was owing on the principal at the time of his death. The eldest son was partly self-supporting, and the elder daughter about to start work. The youngest child was delicate.

The deceased died intestate, and his widow as administratrix of his estate brought an action for damages against the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

HEATLEY v. STEEL COMPANY OF WALES LD.

Croom-Johnson J., on July 11, 1952, gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding the defendants liable for negligence and breach of statutory duty. In assessing the damages payable under the Fatal Accidents Acts, he calculated that on a weekly wage of £12 the amount to be deducted for the notional keep of the deceased was £5 a week, so that the family, he held, had lost something like £7 a week contributed by him to their support. Taking 20 years at £7 a week as the estimate of what they had lost, and making allowances for the benefit of money down instead of money payable in the future, he arrived at a figure of £4,000 to be distributed between the widow and the children under the Fatal Accidents Acts. He then apportioned £800 among the four children, leaving for the widow a notional balance of £3,200. His lordship, bearing in mind that the family home was a leasehold house, the estimated value of which was £1,450, held that the widow should give credit for £750 on the equity of redemption on the house, which passed to her on the intestacy. He awarded £400 (plus funeral expenses) under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, for loss of expectation of life, which was deducted from the amount awarded to the widow under the Fatal Accidents Acts, so that she was left with a total lump sum award of £2,050.

The widow appealed against the amount of damages only.

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts and continued:—The judge obviously took a great deal of trouble over this case, and certainly paid attention to what has often been said in these cases, that is, that one must try to find a basic figure, apply a certain number of years' purchase, and discount some of it because one is paying down a lump sum at once; that is to say, one has to find the present value. But no case, I think, ever has laid down, nor can lay down, the number of years to be taken nor how the amount is to be discounted. There are many other matters to be considered here, and we should not interfere with the award of a judge merely because we thought that it was too low, unless it was very much too low, and unless we were satisfied that he had applied some wrong principle. I think that it is a very difficult problem, certainly in regard to two matters on which we disagree with the judge.

In the first place, in considering the weekly income lost to the family he has allowed no less than £5 a week for the keep of the father—or, rather, the father had £1 spending money, and, therefore, the judge has allowed £4 a week because, he said, the keep of the husband altogether would come to £5 a week. With great respect to the judge, there was no evidence on this. The widow was not asked anything about it. Her proof was read, but there was nothing in the proof about it; and it is very difficult to say, even over a period of years, that the man would be taking as much as £5 a week—certainly not out of £10 a week, his income at the time of the accident. The widow, unfortunately, was never asked what she thought it cost her. I should say that the judge had taken much too large a sum, and I think that he must have done it per incuriam. I do not think that anybody would say that at the present time and at present prices, when there is a family of six, the feeding and clothing of the father would be allowed to come to as much as £4 a week, especially when his own personal expenses, such as tobacco and an occasional glass of ale, were provided for by his keeping £1 for himself out of his pay packet. We think, therefore, that the judge must have gone wrong in taking so high a figure as £5 for one member of this family.

A more serious matter on which we differ from the judge is with regard to the leasehold house, which passed on the deceased's death intestate, under the provisions of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, to the widow and the four children (or such of them as attain the age of 21 years or marry) who are between them entitled to the whole estate. The widow's interest greatly predominates, as, apart from the few personal chattels, which go to her absolutely, she takes £1,000 with interest thereon at five per cent. per annum from the death of her husband on March 30, 1951, and a life interest in half the ultimate residue. Now the residue, before providing the £1,000 and interest, appears to consist of nothing more than the house subject to the mortgage, and the equity of redemption is worth not more than £1,200, the value of the house being some £1,450 and the outstanding balance of the mortgage some £260. What allowance, if any, should be made in the assessment of damages for the beneficial interests thus accruing to the widow, and in some small degree to the children, by reason of the death? It is very difficult to see how any substantial sum whatever can be allowed for these interests. Pending any sale of the house, the widow will no doubt continue to live in it with her family exactly as she did before, the children being provided with a home there exactly as they were before. What the court has to try to ascertain in these cases is: How much have the widow and family lost by the father's death? This is not a case where, by the death of the father, the widow will come into some large sum of money of which she never before had the handling. She will simply continue to live in this house and provide a home there for the children until it is sold, and if and when it is sold she will have to get another house. At any rate, her two younger children are likely to be living with her in this house or elsewhere for a long time, and her two elder children are still dependent on her. The court cannot see that there is really any sum to be deducted for the value of the house at all. It is true that a successful sale of the house might produce as much as £1,200. But if it were sold and she went out, she would have to go somewhere else. To get accommodation for these children she would have to get another house, and she would be lucky if she could get another house for rent. The fact is that she is in the same position as she was; she has not benefited, save possibly by some nominal amount, by her husband's death. The trifling interests of the children under the intestacy are offset by the necessity for providing them with a home, and it obviously cannot improve the position of themselves and their mother considered collectively. It may be that some value could be shown on paper for the, so to speak, reversionary interests in the lease of the house which, but for the untimely death of the deceased, would not have accrued to his wife and children for many years; but that is hardly a matter which from a practical point of view can be taken into account at all.

Here are the wife and four children of a man who was just about to earn £12 a week. That was a considerable step up for him; he would have risen in the scale by something just over £2 a week. That, in turn, would be an uplift for her. The elder children did not contribute; the son was not yet supporting himself; he was earning money, but his tools and lunches, and one thing and another, more than offset what he was giving to his mother; and there was some very small sum from the elder daughter. But if the father's wages had gone up to £12 a week that would have put the widow in a very much more comfortable position when the children did become self-supporting.

In these cases the number of years' purchase that a judge can reasonably take is entirely arbitrary, and entirely a matter of speculation. If one finds a basic wage and multiplies it by a certain number of years it may be actuarially possible to calculate the amount by which to reduce that to its present value; but what the court really has to do is to find a sum of money which in its view will fairly compensate this family. One judge may arrive at it in one way: another judge may arrive at it in another way. If this court comes to the conclusion that the judge has taken an unduly high multiplier, or an unduly low one, it can interfere; but this court could not interfere unless it thought that the amount was really arrived at on a wrong principle. We have shown that in our opinion there are two deductions made by the judge which cannot be justified, and it does seem that for a family of this sort, which has lost a father in the prime of life, £3,250 is a very, very low award. Under the Law Reform Act £400 was awarded, and, therefore, any sum that may be awarded under the Fatal Accidents Act has to be diminished by that amount. This court, giving the best consideration it can to this case, thinks that the fair amount to have awarded was £6,000, less the £400 awarded under the Law Reform Act, as to which there is no appeal.

Appeal allowed. Damages increased to £6,000, £400 and £35 15s. 6d. for funeral expenses being attributed to damages under the Law Reform Act. Apportionment to the children increased from £800 to £1,000.

Negligence — Vicarious liability — Agency — Driving of motor-car — Accident—Car driven for owner for purpose of holiday with him—Request followed by social or moral obligation.

Damage was caused to a motor-bus by the negligent driving of a motor-car. The car was being driven by a friend of the owner from Birkenhead to Monte Carlo with the intention that the friend, his wife (who was in the car), and the owner should all three later use the car for the purpose of a holiday in Switzerland. The owner, meanwhile, was attending, as a competitor, a motor-car rally at Monte Carlo in another car:—

Held, that the owner of the motor-car was vicariously liable for the damage caused to the bus by his friend's negligence, since the arrangement amounted to a request by the owner to the friend to drive the car, the owner had an interest in that being done, and the friend was under a social or moral obligation to do it.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought the action for damages for personal injuries to them both caused by the alleged negligent driving of a motor bus owned by the first defendants and driven by their servant or agent the second defendant. The first defendants counterclaimed in respect of damage to their motor bus, alleging negligent driving of the motor car by the male plaintiff. They also took third party proceedings against the owner of the car, alleging that he was vicariously liable for the male plaintiff's negligence.

The plaintiffs left Birkenhead just before mid-day on January 20, 1952, in a Healey motor-car belonging to the third party who, with another person, was driving from Glasgow in a Standard Vanguard car as a competitor in the Monte Carlo motor-car rally. It was agreed between the plaintiff Ormrod and the third party that Mr. and Mrs. Ormrod should use the Healey car to drive to Monte Carlo, and that thereafter all three would holiday together in Switzerland, using the Healey car for this purpose. A suitcase belonging to the third party was being carried in the Healey car, and it was agreed that Mr. and Mrs. Ormrod should make the journey to Monte Carlo by driving the Healey car in their own time and manner, and they were to visit friends at Bayeux en route. It was the intention of all that Mr. and Mrs. Ormrod should arrive with the Healey car at Monte Carlo before the end of the rally.

Soon after leaving Birkenhead the plaintiffs in the Healey car came into collision with the first defendants' motor bus in thick fog, and both plaintiffs sustained personal injuries and both vehicles were damaged. Devlin J. found that the accident was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff driver, and the case is reported only on the issue of third party liability.

DEVLIN J., after stating the facts in relation to the question of third party liability:—I have now to decide the question of the liability of the owner of the Healey car for the damage arising from the negligent driving of Mr. Ormrod. Hewitt v. Bonvin [1] is concerned partly with the question of a servant, and there is no question of Mr. Ormrod being a servant in this case, but du Parcq L.J. deals with the question of agency.[2] It is clear that there must be something more than the granting of mere permission in order to create liability in the owner of a motor-car for the negligence of the driver to whom it has been lent. But I do not think that it is necessary to show a legal contract of agency. It is in an area between the two that this case is to be found, and it may be described as a case where, in the words of du Parcq L.J., there is a "social or moral" obligation to drive the owner's car.[3] Mr. Ormrod was under such a duty as this; for if he had not driven the car as arranged, then the third party would have had a legitimate grievance. I think that the arrangement amounted to a request to Mr. Ormrod to drive the car. He who complies with such a request is the agent of the other, since he who makes the request has an interest in its being done. In this case the car was wanted for the purpose of a joint holiday; that was enough to give the third party an interest in the arrival of the car, so that the driving became an act done for his benefit. In the case of mere permission the person permitting has no interest in whether the act is done or not.

* REGINA v. INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES TRIBUNAL AND OTHERS. Ex parte KIGASS LD.

Lord Goddard C.J., Lynskey and Pearson JJ.

Trade Dispute—Reference to Industrial Disputes Tribunal—Claim by union to implement award to union members—Workers subsequently becoming members of union—Existence of dispute—Award retrospective to date before dispute arose—Jurisdiction of tribunal—Industrial Disputes Order, 1951 (S.I. 1951, No. 1376), arts. 1, 8, 10.

Jurisdiction—Certiorari—Dispute between workers in Scottish factory and English employers—Award by Industrial Disputes Tribunal sitting in England—Jurisdiction of Scottish courts—Jurisdiction of English courts—Comity.

A company registered in England employed female engineering workers in a factory in Scotland. On January 18, 1952, the Industrial Disputes Tribunal issued award No. 88 in a dispute which had arisen between similar workers, members of trade unions, and an employers' federation, awarding a wage increase of 10s. 1d. a week to the workers with effect from November 23, 1951. At that time none of the company's female workers were members of a trade union, nor were they, or the company, members of the organizations concerned in that dispute. But by February 11, 1952, some of the workers had become members of a union which claimed that the workers should receive an increase of 10s. 1d. a week. The company refused the claim. On May 3, 1952, the union reported a dispute to the Minister, who referred it to the tribunal. The tribunal issued an award on July 8, 1952, describing the dispute as arising out of a claim by the workers for an increase of 10s. 1d. a week operative as from November 23, 1951, as provided for in award No. 88. By the award the tribunal found in favour of the claim and awarded accordingly. On an application by the company for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the award of July 18, 1952, on the grounds (1) that no dispute capable of being reported to the Minister or referred to the tribunal had ever existed and, therefore, the tribunal had no jurisdiction to make the award; and alternatively (2) that the award, in that it was retrospective to a date before the dispute had arisen, was ultra vires and bad:—

Held, (1) that there was a dispute properly referred to the tribunal, who consequently had power to inquire into that dispute, since whether or not the workers wanted the claim put forward was immaterial, as a claim made by the union on behalf of some of the workers who were members of that union had been refused, and the union, on behalf of its members, reported the dispute to the Minister, who had the power to refer it to the tribunal; but (2) that the earliest date from which the tribunal could have awarded a wage increase was the date when the dispute arose, which must have been after January 18, 1952, when award No. 88 was issued, and, since the award gave a wage increase from November 23, 1951, the award was bad, and must be quashed.

As the factory where the dispute arose was situated in Scotland the courts of Scotland had jurisdiction to entertain the matter, but as the company was registered in England and the tribunal had sat in England the English courts also had jurisdiction. Although there could be no objection in point of law or in point of comity to the matter being determined by an English court, it would be better, where the whole subject-matter of a dispute arose in Scotland, that proceedings should be taken in the Scottish courts.

APPLICATION for order of certiorari.

The applicants, a company registered in England, carried on the business of the manufacture of aircraft component parts at a factory at Paisley, in Scotland, where they employed a number of female workers.

The following facts appeared from affidavits filed on one side or the other:—

On November 23, 1951, a dispute arose between members of associations federated with the Engineering and Allied Employers' National Federation and certain workers employed by them, being members of, among other unions, the Amalgamated Engineering Union, over the question of the wages of women workers in the engineering industry. On December 19 this dispute was reported to the Minister of Labour and National Service who, on December 31, 1951, referred it, under article 8 [1] of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal for settlement. On January 18, 1952, the Industrial Disputes Tribunal issued award No. 88, providing "that all female workers 18 years of age and over shall receive "an increase of 10s. 1d. per week of 44 hours, with proportionate "increases for those under 18 years of age. . . . This award "shall have effect as from the beginning of the first full pay "period following November 23, 1951."

[1] Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, art. 8: "Where a dispute has been "reported to the Minister . . . the "dispute shall, if not otherwise "settled, be referred to the tribunal "for settlement."

The applicant company were not members of the Engineering and Allied Employers' National Federation or of any federated association nor, between November 23, 1951, and the beginning of February, 1952, were any female workers employed by them members of the Amalgamated Engineering Union, or any union concerned in that dispute.

The secretary of the Paisley district of the Amalgamated Engineering Union explained the terms of award No. 88 to some of the female workers employed by the company. By February 11 some of those workers appeared to have become members of the union, which negotiated with the company, but no conclusion satisfactory to both parties was reached.

On May 3, 1952, the union reported a dispute to the Minister which, on May 30, 1952, the Minister referred to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal under article 8 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951. On July 8, 1952, the tribunal issued award No. 193, containing the following particulars of the dispute:

"A. The Parties.—Employers: Kigass Ld., 90 Glasgow "Road, Paisley. Workers: Members of the Amalgamated "Engineering Union in the employment of the said employers.

"B. Description of the Dispute.—The dispute arises out of "a claim made by the workers for an increase of 10s. 1d. to "female workers (18 years and over) with a proportionate "increase for those under 18 years of age, operative as from "the first full pay period following November 23, 1951, as "provided for in the Industrial Disputes Tribunal award No. 88.

"C. Nature of the Dispute.—The dispute was reported to "the Minister on the third day of May, 1952, by the Amalgamated "Engineering Union . . . on behalf of the workers." By the award: "They [the tribunal] find in favour of the claim and "award accordingly."

The company applied for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the award on the grounds that the tribunal had jurisdiction under the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, only where a dispute which existed in a trade or industry was reported to the Minister under article 1 [2] of the Order, and that, as no such dispute had existed between the company and any of its workers there was no dispute capable of being reported to the Minister and, therefore, no dispute capable of being referred to the tribunal who had, accordingly, acted without jurisdiction.

During the hearing leave was given to add, as a further ground of the application, that, in that the award was retrospective to a date at which the dispute did not exist, it was

LORD GODDARD C.J. In this case Mr. Lawson moves for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an award of the Industrial Disputes Tribunal dated July 8, 1952, which purported to be an award following on a reference by the Minister of Labour and National Service of a dispute in which the parties were said to be Kigass Ld., of 90 Glasgow Road, Paisley, and certain workers of the Amalgamated Engineering Union in the employment of the said employers.

Yesterday we considered the question whether it would be right for this court to deal with the matter or whether it ought to have gone to the Court of Session, and we came to the conclusion that, although it would no doubt be within the competence of the Court of Session to hear the case, the company had their registered office in this country and the tribunal had sat in this country, and therefore there would be no objection on a point of law or point of comity to this court hearing and determining the motion. At the same time, speaking for myself, I cannot help thinking that it would be much better, where the whole subject-matter of the dispute has arisen in Scotland, that the proceedings should be taken in the Scottish and not the English courts but, as I have said, we hold that, from the point of view of comity, there is no objection to our going into the matter.

The application was originally made simply on the ground that no dispute existed between the employers and the workers. On that point the court, for reasons I will give in a moment, determines that a dispute clearly did arise. At a very late stage yesterday, Mr. Lawson sought for and obtained leave to put forward another ground for quashing the order, namely, that the dispute did not exist until about the end of the month of January, 1952, whereas the award purports to date back to a date in November, 1951. The court thinks that that point must be determined equally clearly in favour of the employers.

[3] Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, art. 10: "Where an award on a "dispute . . . has been made by the "tribunal then as from the date of "the award or from such other date, "not being earlier than the date on "which the dispute . . . to which the "award relates first arose, as the "tribunal may direct, it shall be an "implied term of the contract "between the employer and workers "to whom the award applies that the "terms and conditions of employment "to be observed under the contract "shall be in accordance with the "award. . . ."

The matter arises in this way: In January of 1952 the Industrial Disputes Tribunal had heard another case which affected the same class of workers, women workers in the engineering industry, and awarded an increase of wages of 10s. 1d. per week of 44 hours with proportionate increases for those under 18 years of age. In January of 1952 the workers employed by Kigass Ld. were not members of the union. The union, of course, desire to see that all employers pay the same rates of wages, and they managed to persuade or to get—it does not matter which—certain of the women employees of Kigass Ld. into the union. The real complaint that is made here is that, as it was put, the union butted into the affairs of the company and persuaded the workers to become members of the union, and to put forward this claim, which they had not thought of putting forward before; indeed, Kigass Ld. claim that they were paying a higher rate of wages than other employers, but that is not a matter with which we are concerned. The fact is that certain of their women employees had by February 11 become members of the union, and the district organizer then approached the company on their behalf.

The tribunal which made the award in this case is set up by the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, which by paragraph 1 provides: "Where a dispute exists in a trade or industry or "section of trade or industry or in an undertaking and that "dispute is reported to the Minister in accordance with this "Order by—(i) an organization of employers, on behalf of "employers who are parties to the dispute; (ii) an employer, "where the dispute is between that employer and workers in "the employment of that employer; or (iii) a trade union, on "behalf of workers who are parties to the dispute," then the Minister can refer the matter to the tribunal.

There is no question here but that the trade union did report to the Minister on May 2 that a difference had arisen between Kigass Ld. and their female employees and that "the dispute "arises out of a claim made by the said workers for (i) an "increase of 10s. 1d. to female workers (18 years and over) with "a proportionate increase for those under 18 years of age." Whether or not the workers wanted that matter put forward is immaterial. The union had recruited certain of the women workers as members, and on their behalf did report this dispute to the Minister; having read the affidavits filed on behalf of the company as well as the affidavits filed on behalf of the union, it appears to the court that it is indisputable that a difference had arisen. This claim was being made on behalf of some of the workers for 10s. 1d. a week extra on the wages which they were already receiving, and it is perfectly clear that the company were saying that they declined to pay those wages; the Minister, therefore, clearly had power, to refer this matter to the tribunal. Therefore, the first ground which Mr. Lawson put forward is unsound. There was here, in my opinion, a dispute; it was properly referred, and the tribunal consequently had jurisdiction to inquire into that dispute.

The second point that was taken was that the award that was made by the tribunal was ultra vires because they purported to back date it to a date earlier than that at which the dispute in this case had arisen. Article 10 of the Order provides: "Where "an award on a dispute or issue has been made by the tribunal "then as from the date of the award or from such other date, "not being earlier than the date on which the dispute or issue "to which the award relates first arose, as the tribunal may "direct, it shall be an implied term of the contract between the "employer and workers to whom the award applies that the "terms and conditions of employment to be observed under the "contract shall be in accordance with the award until varied by "agreement between the parties or by a subsequent award of "the tribunal."

The tribunal set out in their award the reference to them of the dispute, and the description of the dispute is: "The "dispute arises out of a claim made by the said workers for an "increase of 10s. 1d. to female workers (18 years and over) with "a proportionate increase for those under 18 years of age, "operative as from the first full pay period following Novem-"ber 23, 1951, as provided for in the Industrial Disputes "Tribunal award No. 88"—that is the award to which I have already referred, and the increases in those cases arose on November 23, 1951.

It is quite obvious that there was no dispute between the employers and the workmen in Kigass Ld. on November 23, 1951. No dispute in fact seems to have arisen till February 11, 1952—certainly not until after January 18—and the workers concerned did not become trade unionists, and the trade union official was not acting on their behalf, until February 11.

The award which the tribunal made was that they found in favour of the claim and awarded accordingly. They awarded that Kigass Ld. had to pay these wages as from November 23. There is no question about that, because it is set out earlier in the terms of the award: "And that the company should be "required to pay the increases provided thereunder as from "November 23, 1951." We can only read that as meaning that the wages are to be increased as from November 23, 1951, but in my opinion the tribunal had no jurisdiction to award an increase from that date. The earliest date from which they could have made an award was from the date when the dispute arose; it was for the tribunal no doubt to determine that date and to have awarded from that date, and they should have so awarded.

In these circumstances, as we cannot amend the award, the award is bad and an order of certiorari must go and the award must be quashed.

LYNSKEY J. I agree.

PEARSON J. I agree, and I only want to mention one or two points. I do not think that it is necessary to decide at what date the dispute arose. Different views might be taken as to whether the dispute which took place after the intervention of the union officer was the same dispute as the one which had been going on before; but what is quite plain on the face of the award itself and the evidence given by affidavit is that the dispute in question here could not have been before January 18; it must have begun afterwards. I say that because the origin of the dispute was that workers in the employment of these employers, Kigass Ld., asked that they should have the advantage conferred on other workers by the award No. 88, and the award No. 88 was issued on January 18, 1952. The dispute could not have started until after that award had been issued, and therefore the origin of it cannot be put at any earlier date than some time in January, 1952, and it may be that it should be put at some date in the month of February, 1952.

The other point is that it was contended by Sir Frank Soskice on behalf of the union that the award did not contain any direction ante-dating the effect of the award to some time in November, 1951. It is perfectly true that the award does not contain any words such as "we hereby direct," but I think for the reasons which have been given such a direction must be implied in order to effectuate the manifest intention. Therefore, there is an implied direction by necessary implication that the award shall operate as from the first full pay period following November 23, 1951.

I entirely agree with the order to be made.

On July 3, 1948, a workman was killed as a result of an accident alleged to have been caused by the negligence of his employers. His administratrix issued a writ against the employers claiming damages under the Law Reform Act and the Fatal Accidents Acts within 12 months of his death. On July 4, 1949, the administratrix added as second defendants the occupiers of the factory where the accident had taken place, but the claim against them under the Fatal Accidents Acts was later struck out because the action against them had been commenced outside the period of limitation of 12 months prescribed by section 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846. On February 9, 1950, the first defendants by notice claimed contribution in respect of the claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts from the second defendants under section 6 (1) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. The second defendants contended that, as the plaintiff had brought no action against them within the time prescribed by section 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, the first defendants' claim for contribution must fail:—

Held, that section 6 (1) (c) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, required the court to determine whether the second defendants would have been liable assuming that they had been sued in the past; that the second defendants would have been liable if sued in the 12 months after the workman's death, and that it was no answer for them to say that they were not sued within that period, and they were accordingly liable to make contribution under section 6.

ACTION.

On July 3, 1948, the late James Frederick Morgan was killed as the result of an accident while employed by the first defendants in a factory owned and occupied by Samuel Fox & Co. Ld., the second defendants. In consequence the widow brought an action against the first defendants claiming damages under the Law Reform Act and the Fatal Accidents Acts. She began that action within 12 months of the death. On July 4, 1949, she added Samuel Fox & Co. Ld. as the second defendants. Later the claim against them under the Fatal Accidents Acts was struck out on the ground that the action against them was commenced after the lapse of 12 months from the death, and so was outside the period of limitation prescribed by section 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846.

[Reported by G. M. SMAILES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

On February 9, 1950, however, the first defendants, by the appropriate notice, claimed contribution from the second defendants in respect of any damages and costs which the first defendants might have to pay to the widow under the Fatal Accidents Act, on the ground that the second defendants were in this respect joint tortfeasors.

December 19, 1952. DONOVAN J., reading his judgment, stated the above facts and continued: The second defendants do not now dispute that they were joint tortfeasors, but claim that, inasmuch as the widow herself brought no action against them under the Fatal Accidents Act within time, the claim for contribution must necessarily fail. That is the issue which I have to try. Section 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, provides as follows: "Provided always, that not more than one action "shall lie for and in respect of the same subject matter of "complaint; and that every such action shall be commenced "within twelve calendar months after the death of such deceased "person." The claim for contribution is made by the first defendants under the provisions of section 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. So far as is material, subsection (1) of that section reads: "(c) any tortfeasor "liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from "any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable "in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tortfeasor "or otherwise." The second defendants contend that they are not within section 6 (1) (c) inasmuch as they are not persons who are, or would, if sued, have been, liable in respect of the same damage, since the plaintiff let 12 months go by without suing them under the Fatal Accidents Act.

The purpose of the words "who is, or would if sued have "been, liable" is to identify the joint tortfeasor against whom contribution may be sought. He may be either (a) a person who is liable, for example, because he has been sued already, or (b) a person who is not so liable but who, if sued, would have been liable. Why are the second defendants not liable as falling within the second category? Because, they say, they cannot be sued now, or because when they were in fact sued it was too late, the period of limitation having expired. Section 6, however, does not ask whether the other tortfeasor can be sued now or whether he was in fact sued in time in the past. What it does ask is this: first, is the other tortfeasor liable in respect of the same damage? The second defendants in the present case can answer that question in the negative, not having been sued in time. Next, would the other tortfeasor have been liable if sued? This question obviously requires one to make the assumption that the other tortfeasor was sued in the past and to determine on that hypothesis whether he would have been liable. If, in obedience to this direction, I assume that the second defendants were sued in the past, the answer is that they would have been liable in respect of the damage in question. They would have been liable if sued in the past, namely in the 12 months after Mr. Morgan's death. Accordingly, in my view they are liable to make contribution under section 6, and it is no answer to say, "Yes, but in fact we were not sued within that 12 months." Section 6 is dealing in part with the case of joint tortfeasors not sued in fact.

MORGAN v. ASHMORE, BENSON, PEASE & CO. LD. AND SAMUEL FOX & CO. LD.

Donovan J.

It can, of course, be urged, and is, that it is anomalous that the second defendants, safe behind the shield of limitation afforded by the Fatal Accidents Act, are nevertheless open to attack, almost from the rear, under the Law Reform Act in respect of the same damage. On the merits that consideration is not very moving. The 12 months' limit in the Act of 1846 is an arbitrary one, and in the present case was exceeded by only one day. But the true answer is that the anomaly, if it be such, cannot alter the construction of section 6 of the Law Reform Act if the words be plain, as I think they are. Reference was made, however, to Merlihan v. A. C. Pope Ld., Pagnello third party.[1] I am uncertain as to the exact ground of that decision. The third party proceedings brought against Pagnello were in the nature of a separate action (see Hordern-Richmond v. Duncan[2]), and they were brought outside the period of limitation of 12 months prescribed in favour of public authorities by section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. Pagnello being a Canadian soldier engaged as such at the time of the accident was able to rely on section 21 (1). That being so, it was enough for the disposal of the case, unless the cause of action arose, not at the date of the accident, but at the date when judgment was given against the defendants in that case. If that were so, the third party proceedings would have been in time. This was the central argument in the case, and Birkett J. decided that the cause of the action arose at the date of the accident, so that the third party proceedings were out of time.

In a later case, Hordern-Richmond v. Duncan,[2] Cassels J., speaking obiter, was inclined to take the view that the cause of action in such cases arises when judgment is given against the defendants. This does not concern me in the present case. In the Pagnello case Birkett J. gave his judgment in favour of the third party,[3] "on the express ground that the third-party is " protected by the Limitation Act, 1939, because the cause of " action in fact, accrued on March 15, 1943 " (the date of the accident in that case). But then Birkett J. added these words [3]: " The Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, " certainly made a great change in the law and, apparently, this " particular difficulty was not foreseen. In my opinion, it would " not be a proper interpretation of section 6 (1) (c) to read it as " if the material words were ' who if sued in time would have " ' been liable.' " It is this last sentence which puzzles me. It seems to me to suggest that the third party proceedings were not themselves an action subject to section 21 of the Limitation Act, and what had to be considered was whether the third party could presently be sued by the plaintiff. In that case he could not. If that were the crucial question, then the parties seeking contribution would succeed only if, alternatively, the words in section 6 (1) (c) could be construed as if they meant, " Would the joint tortfeasor have been liable if sued in time?" Birkett J. declined to read the words " in time " into the section. I approach section 6 (1) (c) rather differently, and I have already set out my view as to its construction. But supposing in the Pagnello case [3] the words " in time " had been written into section 6 (1) (c), what difference would it have made? The third party proceedings themselves would still have been out of time in view of section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act. The truth is, I think, that the case before Birkett J. did not require section 6 to be construed as the present case does, and that I am therefore free to express my own view. There will be no conflict between his actual decision in that case and my decision in this. For there is nothing in the present case barring the present claim for contribution as there was in the Pagnello case [3] barring the third party proceedings, namely, section 21 of the Act of 1939. If there is any limitation on the present claim for contribution, it may be the six-year period prescribed by the Act of 1939, though I do not decide this, for it is not necessary to do so, and I gather that there is professional doubt upon the matter. Clearly, section 3 of the Fatal Accidents Act does not require the present claim for contribution to be brought within 12 months of the death, for it refers to " such action," and when read in conjunction with section 1 of the Act means an action under that Act.

For these reasons I decide that the first defendants are entitled to claim contribution from the second defendants. I understand that the amount has already been otherwise settled.

Town and Country Planning—Enforcement notice—Form of notice defective—Invalidity—Appeal against notice to Minister on other grounds — Whether approbated — Estoppel — Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 51), ss. 23 (1), (2), (3), (4); 75 (5).

On May 17, 1949, the defendants, the local planning authority for the county of Middlesex, served on the plaintiffs a notice under section 23 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, requiring them to discontinue work on their premises. The notice did not specify the period after which it was to take effect. The plaintiffs applied to the local planning authority under section 23 (3) (a) for permission to continue their use of the land. That application and a subsequent appeal to the Minister of Town and Country Planning were dismissed. In June, 1950, the plaintiffs instituted proceedings against the defendants claiming declarations that they were entitled to use the land for light industrial purposes, and that the notice was invalid and ineffective as not complying in a material respect with the statutory form. The defendants denied that the notice was invalid, and further contended that even if it was defective in form the plaintiffs, by reason of their conduct after the receipt of the notice, were estopped from denying its validity:—

Held, first, that on the principles laid down in Burgess v. Jarvis [1952] 2 Q.B. 41; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 580; [1952] 1 All E.R. 592 and Mead v. Chelmsford Rural District Council [1953] 1 Q.B. 32; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 700; [1952] 2 All E.R. 723 the notice was invalid, since, in breach of section 23 (3) of the Act of 1947, it had failed to lay down the period after which it was to take effect.

Held, secondly, that, since the particular form of the notice was laid down by Act of Parliament and non-compliance with such a notice, when issued in its proper form, was a criminal offence, no amount of so-called waiver or approbation could make it into a valid document, and, accordingly, the plaintiffs were not estopped from disputing its validity.

The plaintiffs, a firm of building contractors, owned and occupied land at the rear of two houses in Nightingale Road, Wood Green, Middlesex. They used the land for light industrial purposes, namely, for joinery work and for their business. The plaintiffs' predecessor in title had also, for 47 years, used the land for light industrial purposes, namely, photographic engineering, joinery and woodwork, for which he had used machinery which included circular saws, centre lathes and drilling machines.

On May 17, 1949, the defendants, as the local planning authority for the county of Middlesex, served on the plaintiffs, through the Wood Green Borough Council, a notice purporting to be made under sections 23 and 75 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947,[1] directing the plaintiffs to discontinue the work on the premises, which work, the defendants alleged, contravened the provisions of the Act. The notice did not specify the period after which it was to take effect.

Pursuant to the provisions of section 23 (3) (a) of the Act, the plaintiffs thereupon applied for permission to continue to use the land, and upon the defendants' refusal to grant such permission, appealed to the Minister under section 16 (1) of the Act. The appeal was dismissed on March 8, 1950.

[1] Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 23:

"(1) If it appears to the local planning authority that any development of land has been carried out after the appointed day without the grant of permission required in that behalf under this Part of this Act '. . . then, subject to any directions given by the Minister, the local planning authority may within four years of such development being carried out, . . . if they consider it expedient so to do having regard to the provisions of the development plan and to any other material considerations, serve on the owner and occupier of the land a notice under this section.

"(2) Any notice served under this section (hereinafter called an 'enforcement notice') shall specify the development which is alleged to have been carried out without the grant of such permission as aforesaid . . . and may require such steps as may be specified in the notice to be taken within such period as may be so specified for restoring the land to its condition before the development took place. . . .

"(3) Subject to the provisions of the next following subsection, an enforcement notice shall take effect at the expiration of such period (not being less than 28 days after the service thereof) as may be specified therein: Provided that—(a) if within the period aforesaid an application is made to the local planning authority under this Part of this Act for permission for . . . the continuance of any use of the land, to which the enforcement notice relates, the notice shall be of no effect pending the final determination of that application, and if such permission as aforesaid is granted on that application, the notice shall not take effect; . . .

"(4) If any person on whom an enforcement notice is served under this section is aggrieved by the notice, he may, at any time within the period mentioned in the last foregoing subsection, appeal against the notice to a court of summary jurisdiction for the petty sessional division or place within which the land to which the notice relates is situated; and on any such appeal the court—(a) if satisfied that permission was granted under this Part of this Act for the development to which the notice relates, or that no such permission was required in respect thereof, or, as the case may be, . . . shall quash the notice to which the appeal relates."

S. 75: "(1) Where any works on land existing at the appointed day were carried out, . . . in contravention of previous planning control, then, subject to the provisions of this section, the provisions of Part III of this Act with respect to enforcement notices shall apply in relation thereto . . . : Provided that an enforcement notice shall not be served by virtue of the provisions of this section in respect of any works or use . . . at any time after three years from the appointed day.

SWALLOW AND PEARSON v. MIDDLESEX COUNTY COUNCIL.

On June 8, 1950, the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendants, seeking a declaration that they were entitled to use the land for the purposes for which it had been used hitherto. In their amended statement of claim, dated April 25, 1952, they alleged that the notice served by the defendants on May 17, 1949, was invalid, as it did not include all the terms prescribed by the Act.

The defendants denied that the notice was invalid and alleged that the plaintiffs had not challenged its validity when it was served on them. They contended that there were two statutory courses open to the plaintiffs on receipt of the notice, to take action either under section 23 (3) or under section 23 (4).

The plaintiffs had elected to take action under section 23 (3). The defendants therefore alleged that by their conduct the plaintiffs had approbated the notice and were estopped from impugning its validity and from denying the rights of the defendants to proceed upon the notice.

Pursuant to an order of Master Burnand made on November 10, 1952, the following points of law were set down for hearing before the trial of the action: (1) whether the notice of May 17, 1949, was a valid enforcement notice; (2) if it was not valid, whether the plaintiffs were estopped from disputing its validity.

N. N. McKinnon and J. D. James for the plaintiffs.
G. D. Squibb for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument were referred to in the judgment.

PARKER J. These proceedings are brought by the plaintiffs claiming, amongst other things, a declaration that they are entitled to use their premises for light industrial purposes, and a declaration that a document purporting to be an enforcement notice served on them on May 17, 1949, by the Wood Green Borough Council under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, is invalid. Pursuant to an order made by a master on November 10, 1952, two points of law are referred to me for decision. The first is whether that document of May 17, 1949, is a valid enforcement notice; and, secondly, if it is not, whether the plaintiffs in these proceedings are estopped from disputing its validity.

The document of May 17, 1949, in the light of the recent decisions of Burgess v. Jarvis [1] and Mead v. Chelmsford Rural District Council [2] is clearly invalid. Those two decisions make it clear that section 23 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, on its true construction, requires two periods to be set out in the notice: one a period pursuant to section 23 (2), under which a period is to be laid down for the doing of the work or the discontinuance of the use or the restoration of the land, or whatever the matter required to be done consists of, and the other is a period under subsection (3) of that section, which is the period after the expiration of which the notice itself is to take effect.

The document of May 17, 1949, which is in a form probably used by numbers of local authorities before the decision in Burgess v. Jarvis,[3] is clearly invalid as failing to lay down the period after which the enforcement notice is to take effect. Mr. Squibb has argued, though I think rather faintly, that in this particular case that defect is overcome by certain notes which are attached to the notice and to which on the face of the notice attention is drawn in these words: "Your attention is "particularly drawn to the notes accompanying this notice as to "the rights of the person upon whom a notice is served." It is true that those notes, which set out and to some extent paraphrase sections of the Act, do draw the attention of the addressee of the document to his rights in regard to appeals and such matters, but nowhere do they say within what period those rights accrue to him. Incidentally, it is to be observed in passing that even the notes themselves are not accurate, because on the facts of this case section 75 (5) applies in the place of section 23 (4) (a).

Accordingly, I answer the first question by holding that the enforcement notice is invalid.

With regard to the second point, namely, whether the plaintiffs are estopped from disputing the validity of the notice, Mr. Squibb, upon whom the burden rests, drew attention to the fact that only two days later, on May 19, 1949, the plaintiffs, as they were entitled to do—one of the steps, indeed, contemplated by section 23 of the Act—applied to the local planning authority for permission to continue the use, and on July 13, 1949, that application was refused. Not content with that, the plaintiffs then appealed to the Minister of Town and Country Planning from the decision of the local town planning authority, and finally, on March 8, 1950, that appeal was refused.

It was pointed out by Mr. Squibb, and it was undoubtedly true, that those applications and appeals were on the basis that the document of May 17, 1949, was a valid enforcement notice. He accordingly argued that, having treated that document as a good notice, the plaintiffs were estopped from denying its invalidity. He further pointed out that, so far as the pleadings were concerned, the plaintiffs did not take the point affirmatively that the notice was a bad notice until an amendment of the pleadings on April 25, 1952, whereas under the proviso to section 75 (1) the time for serving an enforcement notice in such a case as this expired three years after the appointed day, namely, on July 1, 1951.

SWALLOW AND PEARSON v. MIDDLESEX COUNTY COUNCIL.

Parker J.

In that connexion Mr. Squibb referred me to W. Davis (Spitalfields) Ld. v. Huntley and Others.[4] In that case it was held that a tenant, having applied for a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, on the basis of his existing lease having been determined, could not thereafter as against the landlord set up that a notice given to him by the landlord was invalid and had not terminated the lease. I am not in my own mind quite clear how far those principles apply when one is considering something which is prescribed by Act of Parliament. There is no doubt that a man in such a case is entitled to waive, or to agree to waive, the advantage of the law or rule made solely for his benefit and protection. It is equally clear that no person can waive a provision or a requirement of the law which is not solely for his benefit but which is for the public benefit. In my view, however, in this case, if one looks at it more closely, the plaintiffs are not waiving some irregularity for their benefit, but, it is said, are estopped from denying that a particular document is valid. This enforcement notice is one which Parliament has said must be in a particular form, and when it is in that particular form its non-observance is a criminal offence, not only on the part of the person on whom it is served but, in some cases, on others, and I cannot think that in such a case a person can make a document which is patently unenforceable on its face into a valid document carrying the consequences which I have described. I do not think that any amount of so-called waiver or approbation can make a document such as this, which is patently and wholly invalid, into a valid document with the consequences that would follow.

In those circumstances I hold that the plaintiffs are not estopped.

On July 28, 1949, while standing on a mechanical stacker or fork-lift, the plaintiff, who was employed by the second defendants at their aerodrome, was injured in a collision between the fork-lift and a lorry owned by the first defendants. The fork-lift was being used for carrying drums of waste oil, which had been drained from aircraft, to a tank into which it was emptied and from which it was collected from time to time by a contractor to whom the oil was sold by the corporation. On April 26, 1951, the plaintiff issued a writ against the first defendants claiming damages for negligence, and the corporation was subsequently joined as defendants in the action. Parker J. held that both defendants were prima facie liable to the plaintiff. The corporation, however, claimed to be a public authority and, the action not having been brought within a year of the injury, that they were entitled to the protection of section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939:—

Held, that by virtue of the provisions of the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, the corporation were constituted a public authority; the disposal by them of the waste oil into the tank was incidental to and necessarily part of the performance by them of their public duty notwithstanding that the oil was sold under contract; and that, therefore, the plaintiff's claim against the corporation was statute barred.

In an action against two defendants for damages for negligence, both defendants were held to have been negligent, but the claim against the second defendants, a public authority, not having been brought within a year of the cause of action, was held to be statute barred. On a claim in third party proceedings by the first defendants under section 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935, against the second defendants for contribution:—

Held, that the word "liable" in section 6 (1) (c) meant "held "liable" on being sued to judgment, and, therefore, the claim as between the plaintiff and the second defendants having been held to be statute barred, they had not been held "liable" and the first defendants were not entitled to contribution from them.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff was employed by the second defendants, British Overseas Airways Corporation, as an aeroplane cleaner at London Airport. On July 28, 1949, he was instructed by the foreman, one Hubbard, to empty drums of waste oil, which had been drained from aircraft, into a tank situated on the aerodrome. To do this a mechanical stacker or fork-lift was used. The machine, which was driven by Hubbard, was run up to a trailer containing the drums of oil, and two drums were rolled on to the forks of the machine which were then elevated to some eight feet with the plaintiff standing on the forks and holding on to the edge of one of the drums. The machine was then driven to the tank and the drums emptied into it from the elevated position. There was no ladder on the tank, and neither Hubbard nor the plaintiff had been instructed on how the job should be done.

While carrying out this work, and at a time when the forks of the machine were elevated, a lorry owned by the first defendants, George Wimpey & Co. Ld., and driven by one Swadling, ran into the machine, knocking the plaintiff to the ground and injuring him. On April 26, 1951, the plaintiff issued a writ against the first defendants claiming damages for the negligence of their driver. On June 8, 1951, the first defendant served a third party notice on the corporation claiming contribution or indemnity. On February 1, 1952, the plaintiff obtained leave to join the corporation as parties, against whom he alleged negligence by Hubbard, breach of duty by the corporation in failing to provide a safe system of working, and breach of section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, in failing to provide the plaintiff with a safe means of access to his place of work.

Both defendants denied negligence, and, in the alternative, pleaded contributory negligence. The corporation further denied breach of statutory duty, and pleaded, both as against the plaintiff and the first defendants, that, as a public authority, they were entitled to the protection of section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939.[1]

Melford Stevenson Q.C. and Leslie Scarman for the corporation.

The cases referred to in argument are stated in the judgment.

PARKER J. stated the facts, held that the first defendants were guilty of negligence, and that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of Hubbard, but that in sending the plaintiff and Hubbard to do the work without instructions, and in failing to provide a ladder to the tank, the corporation were guilty of providing an unsafe system of work. He continued: The claim against the corporation is also based on a breach of section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, in failing to provide safe means of access to the plaintiff's place of work. The matter has not been fully argued before me, and it is unnecessary for me to express an opinion although, as at present advised, I am inclined to think that the fork-lift was both a place of work and a means of access, according to its use at the moment, and that the corporation are in breach of their duty following the decision in Dorman Long & Co. Ld. v. Hillier.[1]

Prima facie, both Wimpeys and the corporation are liable to the plaintiff. Both, however, raise a plea of contributory negligence. So far as the corporation is concerned, I think that it is put forward in a half-hearted fashion. Mr. Melford Stevenson said that the plaintiff could have held on, and that if he had done so he would not have fallen. It is difficult to see how he could have held on except in the way in which he did.

Mr. Diplock said that as against Wimpeys the plaintiff cannot rely on the fact that his employers ordered him to be in that unsafe position. He put forward this proposition: if a man on orders from his employer does something which, to any reasonable man is dangerous, he is at fault in failing to take reasonable steps for his own safety. I feel unable to accept that proposition. The test, as it seems to me, is: was the plaintiff, in all the circumstances, taking reasonable care for his own safety? He was doing what he had seen others do before him. He was doing the only thing that he could do with the apparatus and appliances which his employers had provided, and I think that it is going much too far to say that a man fails to take reasonable care for his own safety if he agrees to do what his employers want him to do without, in effect, going on strike. Certainly, in the present case, I think that the plaintiff was, in all the circumstances, taking reasonable care for his own safety. Accordingly, the pleas of contributory negligence fail.

The corporation, however, rely on section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. That section, which replaced section 1 (a) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, provides: "No "action shall be brought against any person for any act done in " pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of " Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of " any neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty " or authority, unless it is commenced before the expiration of " one year from the date on which the cause of action accrued." If that section applies the claim against the corporation is clearly barred.

It has long been held that before a person, to use a neutral term, can claim the benefit of that section, he must show that he is a public authority because, although the words are " No " action shall be brought against any person," it has always been construed as meaning any person in the position of a public authority. Secondly, it must be proved that, assuming he is a public authority, the neglect or default complained of was the neglect or default in the execution of a public duty or authority.

As regards the first question, whether the corporation is a public authority, the matter is not easy, because no court, advisedly, has attempted to lay down any test or definition as to what is and what is not a public authority. It is clearly not enough that it is a body created by statute required to do things for the public benefit, for example, a railway company. It is equally clear that a commercial company, albeit, set up by a statute, which is entitled to trade for the benefit of its incorporators, is not a public authority. See in this connexion Swain v. Southern Ry.[2] and Att.-Gen. v. Margate Pier and Harbour Proprietors.[3] At the same time, the fact that a company is entitled to make a profit for itself does not prevent it from being a public authority. In Griffiths v. Smith,[4] to which I must refer again hereafter, Lord Porter said[5]: " In the first place, though " the word ' person ' is used, not every person is protected. It " is a ' Public Authorities Protection Act ' and not a ' persons " ' protection Act ' and therefore the body to be protected must " be a public authority: see Myers v. Bradford Corporation[6] " and The Johannesburg.[7] What, then, is a public authority? " As Sir Gorell Barnes says in the latter case, the phrase is not " confined to municipal corporations. There are many other " bodies which perform statutory duties and exercise public " functions, and examples of such bodies are given by the learned " president. The distinction which he draws is between a body " carrying out transactions for private profit and those working " for the benefit of the public. Profit they may undoubtedly " make for the public benefit: see The Ydun[8] and Lyles v. " Southend-on-Sea Corporation,[9] but they must not be a trading " corporation making profits for their corporators: see Att.-Gen. " v. Margate Pier and Harbour Proprietors.[10] "

In determining whether the corporation is or is not a public authority, I must consider the duties imposed as opposed to the powers given; the degree, if any, of public control; and to whose benefit any profit earned is going to accrue.

The corporation was set up by the British Overseas Airways Act, 1939, under which it took over the undertakings and assets of what were undoubtedly trading companies. By its constitution the corporation was to consist of such members not being less than nine or more than 15, but it was not a company with shareholders in the ordinary way.

Under the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, two new corporations, British European Airways and British South-American Airways, were formed, and the Act lays down the functions of the corporations including those of B.O.A.C. By section 2 (1) it was provided: "Each of the three corporations shall, subject to the "provisions of this Act, have power to provide air transport "services and to carry out all other forms of aerial work, and "may provide such services and carry out such work, whether "on charter terms or otherwise, in any part of the world; and "it shall be the duty of each of the said corporations to exercise "those powers so as to secure that the air services which they "may provide are developed to the best advantage, and, in "particular, to exercise those powers so as to secure that the "services provided by the corporation are provided at reasonable "charges." By section 2 (3) the Minister may define the powers conferred upon the corporations, and by section 7 the corporations were given power to borrow money by the issue of stock.

By sections 17 and 18, the Minister was given, in effect, and, through the Minister, Parliament, the control of the corporations' revenue. By section 17 each of the corporations is to establish a reserve fund, and the Minister has power to give to the corporation directions on "any matter relating to the "establishment or management of the said fund, the carrying "of sums to the credit thereof, or the application thereof, notwithstanding that the directions may be of a specific character."

By section 18 (1) it is provided: "Any excess of the revenues "of any of the three corporations for any financial year over the "total sums properly chargeable by the corporation to revenue "account for that year, including in such sums (without prejudice "to the generality of that expression) sums credited under the "last preceding section to the reserve fund of the corporation, "shall be applied by the corporation in such manner as the "Minister, with the approval of the Treasury and after consultation with the chairman of the corporation, may direct." Provision is then made that if there is any excess of revenue, it is to be used to repay Exchequer grants. There, as it seems to me, the Minister has absolute authority to say what is to be done with any surplus revenue, and how it is to be applied in the public interest.

LITTLEWOOD v. GEORGE WIMPEY & CO. LD. AND BRITISH OVERSEAS AIRWAYS CORPORATION.

Parker J.

There are elaborate provisions in sections 11 to 16 for Exchequer grants and for the Exchequer bearing any losses incurred by a corporation. Under sections 21 and 22, the Minister is given powers with regard to accounts and audit, and the obtaining of periodical returns and being enabled to see each corporation's programme. It seems clear that the intention of this Act was to set up a company entrusted with certain duties in the public interest, and that those duties should be performed irrespective of whether it made a loss or a profit, and, further, that any loss should be made good by the Exchequer, and any revenues should be dealt with as the Minister thought fit. In all the circumstances I feel that under this Act the corporation is constituted a public authority.

An argument was addressed to me based on contemporary legislation. It has certainly been the tendency of the legislature in recent years to make it clear when a body is set up, whether or not it is intended that that body should be a public authority, and I was referred to the fact that under section 1 (1) of the London Passenger Transport Board Act, 1933, it is expressly provided that the Board shall be a public authority. Reference has also been made to the Coal Industry Nationalization Act, 1946, which was passing through Parliament at about the same time as the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, to the Transport Act, 1947, the Electricity Act, 1947, the Gas Act, 1948, and the Iron and Steel Act, 1949, in all of which an express provision was inserted to the effect that section 21 of the Limitation Act, 1939, was not to apply, but that the six year limit under sections 2 and 3 of the Act was to be reduced to three years. In other words it shows, it is said, that Parliament in those Acts made it clear that the bodies so set up were public authorities, and would attract the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1939, had they not been expressly excluded. It is observed that although the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, was passed more or less contemporaneously there is no similar provision in that Act, I do not think, however, that I can attach such weight to that argument as would prevent me from construing the effect of the Civil Aviation Act, 1946, as I have done.

Mr. Diplock also argued that if the corporation had been created a public authority it would have constituted a breach of the Warsaw Convention, 1929. I cannot attach much weight to that argument. In my view the corporation is a public authority.

There remains the difficult question, which arises in all these cases, whether, assuming that the defendant concerned is a public authority, he can claim the protection of section 21 (1) of the Act of 1939, because it is not every act which a public authority does as a result of its statutory powers which enables it to obtain protection. The act complained of must be an act done in the execution of the public duty of the authority. There is a great deal of authority on this matter, but I only propose to refer to three cases. The matter was put very clearly in Griffiths v. Smith.[11] There Lord Simon L.C. said[12]: There is, "however, a second question connected with the construction of "the Act on which it is difficult to reach precision. Assuming "that the 'person' is a public authority in the sense required, "what kind of action by the public authority is to be regarded "as satisfying the conditions of the section that the act must "be 'done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of "'any Act of Parliament or of any public duty or authority,' "or that the neglect or default must be 'in the execution of "'any such Act, duty, or authority?' In one sense, every-"thing that is done by a public authority within the limits of "their statutory powers might be regarded as done in execution "of the statute. Even if a public corporation exist independently "of statute, all their actions within their powers might perhaps "be regarded as done in execution of their public authority. "But this House has decided in the Bradford Corporation case,[13] "that the statute ought not to be given so wide a construction. "'It is not because the act out of which an action arises is "'within their power,' said Lord Buckmaster, 'that a public "'authority enjoys the benefit of the statute. It is because the "'act is one which is either an act in the direct execution of a "'statute, or in the discharge of a public duty, or the exercise "'of a public authority.'"

Lord Maugham in the same case said[14]: "My Lords, the "decision may be more easily understood if it is realized that, "if the argument for the corporation had prevailed, it would "seem to follow that the Act would apply for the benefit of "every public authority if it could be shown that the act done "or intended to be done was intra vires the authority. Thus "every contract entered into for the purpose of carrying out any "such act, however unwise and whatever the neglect or default "of the public authority in carrying out the contract, would "have the protection of the Act of 1893. Moreover, such a "view would have involved the overruling of a number of "decisions, including earlier cases of high authority decided "before the passing of the Act of 1893 relating to similar condi-"tions contained in other Acts of Parliament."

Later Lord Maugham said[15]: "My Lords, since the decision "of this House in the Bradford Corporation case[16] and the tacit "or express approval of the cases I have referred to, it has been "impossible to doubt (if it was doubtful before) that it is not "essential that a public authority seeking to rely on the Act of "1893 must show that the particular act or default in question "was done or committed in discharge or attempted discharge of "a positive duty imposed on the public authority. It is sufficient "to establish that the act was in substance done in the course " of exercising for the benefit of the public an authority or a " power conferred on the public authority not being a mere inci- " dental power, such as a power to carry on a trade." Lord Porter pointed to the difficulties which sometimes arose and said, as indeed is true, that there was no absolute test that could be applied.

In the latest case on this matter, Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. (S.S.) Ld. v. Singapore Harbour Board,[17] Lord Tucker, in giving the advice of the Judicial Committee, set out the considerations to be applied. Having referred to Griffiths v. Smith[18] and the Bradford Corporation case,[19] he said[20]: " In this state " of affairs it will not perhaps cause surprise if their Lordships do " not attempt to accomplish what the noble Lords referred to " above found well nigh impossible, but content themselves with " examining the two cases cited with a view to extracting there- " from certain matters and considerations that are relevant to, " though not necessarily always decisive of, this issue." He set out the considerations in this way[21]: " 1. It is essential to the " protection afforded by the statute that the act or default in " question should be in the discharge of a public duty or the " exercise of a public authority. This assumes that there are " duties and authorities which are not public. (See per Lord " Buckmaster in the Bradford Corporation case.[22]) 2. In " deciding whether the duty or authority has this public quality " it is sometimes relevant to consider whether it arises out of or is " imposed by a contract voluntarily entered into by the public " authority with an individual with whom it is under no obliga- " tion to contract. 3. The mere fact, however, that in the dis- " charge of its duty or the exercise of its authority the public " authority may have made a contract does not of itself deprive " the duty or authority of its public quality. The existence or " absence of a contract is not a decisive test. (See per Lord " Shaw in the Bradford Corporation case.[23]) 4. Effect must be " given to the word ' authority.' This excludes the test of " obligatory, as opposed to permissive, powers."

Applying those considerations, it is argued here that the neglect complained of was not in the execution of a public duty or authority, but in doing something purely incidental thereto. In dealing with that contention, I think that one must be clear in one's own mind what is meant by the word " incidental." I think that it is clear that a public authority is not deprived of the benefit of the section because the act complained of was not done, as one might say, in the direct execution of a public authority or duty. The benefit, I think, is available if they are doing anything which is necessarily part of the performance of their duty, albeit trivial or incidental in that sense.

In Edwards v. Metropolitan Water Board,[24] the position of a water board was considered, whose direct duty was to supply water. An accident occurred while a lorry was returning after carrying pipes for repair to the pipe system. Banks L.J. said[25]: "Mr. Shakespeare endeavoured to bring this case within Bradford Corporation v. Myers.[26] I think it is clear from that case that a public body does not necessarily enjoy the protection of the statute merely because it is acting under a leave or licence conferred upon it or under a permission granted to it by an Act of Parliament. To entitle it to protection it is necessary that it should be acting in pursuance or execution or intended execution of an Act of Parliament or of a public duty or authority. In my view it does not help much to say that the act must be in 'direct' execution of the Act of Parliament or public duty, because that word itself requires explanation. The question in this case is whether the act of sending this lorry on its journey was an act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of the statutes which impose upon the respondents their duties, or in execution of a public duty. The main duty of the respondents is to supply water for the public living and carrying on business within their area; but there are many duties incidental to that main duty, and one of these is a duty to keep and maintain their pipes in proper working condition." I think that Lord Tucker had that use of the word "incidental" in mind when in the Singapore Harbour Board case,[27] having referred to the passage which I have read from the speech of Lord Maugham in Griffiths v. Smith,[28] where he talked of "a mere incidental power, such as a power to carry on a trade," Lord Tucker said[29]: "The word 'incidental' is here used in the sense of 'subsidiary.' It has in these cases sometimes been used as equivalent to 'necessarily incidental to.'" Then he said that to avoid confusion he preferred to use the word "subsidiary."

In the present case, I am satisfied that as part of their public duty the defendant corporation had to drain oil out of engine pumps of aircraft into containers. It is clearly impractical for them to have an unlimited supply of empty containers available, and it was part of the performance of their duty to dispose of the waste oil by emptying the receptacles. To that extent what they were doing was incidental to and necessarily part of the performance of their public duty. But it was argued forcibly by Mr. Beney that that was the position in Bradford Corporation v. Myers,[30] because in that case, he said, the corporation were disposing of their coke, which was being produced all the time in the manufacture of gas, under a particular contract, and the disposal of the coke was held to be purely subsidiary, merely done in the performance of the corporation's powers and not incidental to their public duty as gas undertakers. So, here, it is said that this accident occurred while the oil was being delivered into a waste tank, which was the property of a contractor who was going to empty it and pay for the oil. I am not satisfied that that is the correct argument.

The whole basis of the Bradford Corporation case,[30] as I understand it, is that the act complained of was done purely in the course of implementing a specific contract. There was no evidence in that case of the type which I have had here, that what was being done was for the purpose of freeing the corporation's premises of coke, and that unless they were so freed the corporation would not be able to carry on their public duty as gas undertakers. Indeed, it seems to me that if there had been evidence to that effect in that case and the argument had been put on that basis, there might have been a different result. It is to be observed that in Edwards v. Metropolitan Water Board[31] Banks L.J. said[32]: "Mr. Shakespeare contended that if in Brad- "ford Corporation v. Myers[33] the corporation had been moving
"coke from their gas works in order to get rid of it, and so
"remove an impediment in the way of executing their statutory "duty of supplying gas, the decision of the House of Lords must "still have been for the plaintiff. There I join issue. In my "view if the corporation had been moving the coke in order to "clear their gas works that they might better fulfil their statu"tory duty the decision of the House of Lords would have been
"the other way."

In the present case I am satisfied that on this particular morning these drums were being emptied to enable oil to be drained into the empty drums from aircraft coming in that afternoon or evening. Looked at in that way, what Hubbard and the plaintiff were doing was clearly, in my view, being done in the execution of the corporation's public duty or authority, and the act does not cease to be done in the performance of that public duty or authority merely because the oil at some later stage will be taken away by a contractor who is going to pay for it. Accordingly, I hold that the corporation can claim the benefit of section 21 of the Limitation Act, 1939, and therefore, the plaintiff's claim succeeds against the first defendants, Messrs. Wimpey, and fails as against the second defendants, the corporation.

Having dealt with the corporation's position as a public authority, I can deal quite shortly with the third party proceedings. Mr. Diplock, for the first defendants, said that, the court having held that the corporation are blameworthy, he is entitled to recover contributions under section 6 (1) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. He is met again by a plea of section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. It is clear that before the first defendants can succeed as against the corporation they must show two things: first, that the corporation is a tortfeasor against whom they are entitled to recover contribution under section 6 (1), and secondly, that the claim against the corporation is brought within one year of the cause of action arising against the corporation. The first difficulty in Mr. Diplock's way is a decision of Birkett J. in Merlihan v. A. C. Pope Ld., Pagnello Third Party.[34] In that case, which is somewhat similar to the present, Birkett J. held that the cause of action to be considered was that arising on the original accident. It was argued in that case that where a person was claiming indemnity or contribution under section 6 (1), the cause of action did not arise until, at any rate, judgment had been given against him so that he had become liable to the injured person. Birkett J. said[35]: "The conclusion to which I "have come is that it is not competent for the defendants to "claim contribution from the third party. I so hold on the "express ground that the third party is protected by the "Limitation Act, 1939, because the cause of action in fact, "accrued on [the date of the accident]."

In Hordern-Richmond Ld. v. Duncan[36] Cassels J. said[37]: "If it had not been for the decision of Birkett J. it may well be "that no such application would have been made. I find it "difficult to say that I should have arrived at the same con-"clusion as Birkett J. arrived at upon the same facts. I take "the view that the Limitation Act only starts to run in favour "of a third party in such circumstances as these when the "defendant has been made liable for the damages."

Mr. Diplock urged that the decision of Birkett J. was wrong, and that the time did not begin to run until this court had held that the first defendants were liable to the plaintiff. In support of that he referred to Collinge v. Heywood,[38] which decided that in the case of a contract to indemnify, the cause of action did not arise until the party to be indemnified was called on to pay, and M'Gillivray v. Hope,[39] which was dealing with contributions under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, to be made by previous employers of a man to whom the last employer was bound by the statute to pay compensation. That was on appeal from the Court of Session, and Lord Tomlin said[40]: "I have no "doubt upon the true construction of clause 9 of the [Various "Industries (Silicosis) Scheme, 1928] (1) that the last employer "is the only person who is under liability to the workman for "the compensation; and (2) that the provision whereby the last "employer is able to recover something in respect of the com-"pensation from previous employers is for the benefit and "protection of the last employer, and not for the benefit of the " workman. I am also of opinion that the words ' such con" ' tributions as in default of agreement may be determined by " ' arbitration ' do not mean ' contributions ' in the strict sense of " that word, that is to say ' sums provided to make up the " ' amount payable to the workman,' but mean such sums by " way pro tanto of indemnity to the last employer for what he " has paid for compensation as in default of agreement may be " determined by arbitration. Further, under the English law, " where one who is liable to pay a sum of money to another is " entitled against a third party to be indemnified in whole or in " part against what he has so to pay, he cannot recover on the " indemnity against this third party where he himself has made

" no payment in respect of his own liability. . . ." Neither of those two cases was referred to in Merlihan's case.[41]

I share with Cassels J. doubts concerning the decision in Merlihan's case.[41] Certainly, if I were approaching this matter apart from authority, I should take the same view as Cassels J. I appreciate that the cases to which I have referred were not before Birkett J.

Although I accede to Mr. Diplock's argument on the first point, there is a further difficulty which faces him. He has to show that the corporation is a tortfeasor who either is liable or would have been liable at suit. It is clear that where the word " liable " occurs in section 6 (1) (c) it means " held liable," and a person cannot be held liable without being sued to judgment. It seems to me that the ordinary meaning of the word here is that if the other tortfeasor has been sued, and sued to judgment, and held liable, contribution can be obtained from him. Also that if he has not been sued at all, but if he had been sued, and sued to judgment, he would have been held liable, recovery can also be made against him. The distinction which is made in paragraph (c) is between the tortfeasor who has been sued to judgment and the tortfeasor who has not been sued at all, or sued to judgment.

Mr. Diplock pointed out quite rightly the absurd and arbitrary results which follow in the case of a person protected as against the injured party by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and section 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939. He also quite rightly pointed out that section 6 (1) (c) is intended to deal only with the position as between the joint tortfeasors, and that it would be ridiculous if one tortfeasor's right of recovery against another depended on the whim of the plaintiff as to when he brought the action, whether he allowed his case to be dismissed for want of prosecution, or whether he entered into a bargain with one of the other tortfeasors not to proceed against that tortfeasor. Mr. Diplock would have me read the section as giving him a right to recover against any tortfeasor who is at fault, whether he has been held liable by being sued to judgment, or whether, although held not liable when sued to judgment, he would have been so held if the action had been brought at the time when the cause of action arose.

I find it impossible to read section 6 (1) (c) in this way. Paragraph (c) is drawing a distinction between somebody who has been sued and somebody who has not, and provides, in effect, that contribution may be recovered from any other tortfeasor who is sued and held liable or, if not sued, would, if sued, have been held liable. By "sued" I mean sued to judgment.

The result, as Mr. Diplock pointed out, on that construction, produced certain absurdities, and there is little doubt that the legislature had not got the point in mind that might arise under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. But it would be wrong, and it is no part of the duty of this court, to supply gaps in legislation. In Magor and St. Mellons Rural District Council v. Newport Corporation,[42] Lord Simonds made it clear that in the construction of the statute "the duty of the court "is to interpret the words that the legislature has used," and it has no power to fill in any gaps disclosed. I feel that the wording here is so plain that, despite the results to which Mr. Diplock has referred, I am constrained to adhere to the plain construction of the section and not to fill gaps in it. For these reasons I think that his claim to recover contribution against the corporation fails, though not for the reason given by Birkett J. in Merlihan's case.[43]

If I were wrong, I would apportion the blame two-thirds to the first defendant and one-third to the corporation.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated January 16, 1919, William Brooke, who died on February 15, 1926, after bequeathing to his wife the interest on £1,000 for her life and after disposing of his residuary estate, directed as follows: " From and after the decease of my " said wife I give and bequeath the said sum of £1,000, or the " investments representing the same, . . . unto and equally " between all my brothers and sisters the children of any being " then dead taking the share their parent would have taken if " living."

The testator had two brothers and seven sisters, of whom (a) four sisters were dead at the date of the will; (b) the two brothers and another sister were living at that date, but predeceased the testator; and (3) two sisters survived the testator and of these one only survived the testator's widow.

The testator had 29 nephews and nieces, of whom 18 survived him and nine were known to be still living at the date of the commencement of these proceedings.

This summons was taken out by the legal personal representative of the testator. He was the executor and universal legatee of his mother, who was the only daughter of the testator, who survived the testator's widow. The questions raised by the summons were whether the class of brothers and sisters of the testator, whose children were entitled to participate in the distribution of the said investments, consisted of (a) brothers and sisters who survived the testator but predeceased his widow; or (b) those who were living at the date of his will but predeceased his widow; or (c) all his brothers and sisters who predeceased his widow and whether alive or dead at the date of his will.

The further question was raised whether the children of any brother or sister of the testator entitled to a share of the said investments took the share as joint tenants or as tenants in common.

R. S. Lazarus for the plaintiff.

M. J. Albery, E. M. Winterbotham, J. L. Eley, for various defendants.

The following cases were referred to in argument: In re Webster [1]; Miller v. Gerrard [2]; Tytherleigh v. Harbin [3]; Loring v. Thomas [4]; Barraclough v. Cooper [5]; In re Lambert [6]; In re Williams [7]; In re Birchall [8]; Greenwood v. Greenwood [9]; In re Froy. [10]

UPJOHN J. This is a summons to determine the true construction of the will of William Brooke, who died on February 15, 1926. His will was duly proved on April 17 of that year and there has been a grant de bonis non to the plaintiff on August 11, 1949.

The testator, after appointing executors and giving two small legacies, said: "I also give and bequeath to my wife the interest "on £1,000, the one half part of the sum invested by us under "our marriage settlement, for the term of her natural life." Then he dealt with his residuary estate and directed his trustees "to pay and divide the balance then remaining unto and equally "between my three sisters, Thirza, Naomi, and Mahala in equal "shares and to whom I give and bequeath the same the children "of any sister being then dead taking the share their parent "would have taken if living." Then he continues: "and from "and after the decease of my said wife I give and bequeath the "said sum of £1,000, or the investments representing the same "and after payment of all expenses connected with the same "including any expenses of realization unto and equally between "all my brothers and sisters the children of any being then dead "taking the share their parent would have taken if living." It is the last bequest of the sum of £1,000 after the decease of the wife with which this summons is concerned. The wife died on February 9, 1945.

The testator's family was somewhat complicated. He had, in all, two brothers and seven sisters. I do not propose to set out all the facts in detail. It is sufficient to say that there was one sister, a spinster, who died before the testator and before the date of his will. That was Sarah Elizabeth Brooke. He also had a sister, Mary Brooke, who survived him and died a spinster on April 3, 1936. He had a large number of nephews and nieces.

The first question which I have to consider is whether the gift "equally between all my brothers and sisters" is a gift to such brothers and sisters contingently on their surviving the widow, or whether it is a gift which vested at the death of the testator. Mr. Lazarus, on behalf of the plaintiff, argues that it is a vested gift. His client is interested indirectly in the estate of Mary Brooke who, as I have said, survived the testator and subsequently died a spinster. On the other hand, Mr. Albery, for the first defendant, submits that, on its true construction, the gift is contingent on the brothers and sisters surviving the widow. The gift in terms is "equally between my brothers and sisters" and that prima facie would vest at the death of the testator. But it goes on, "the children of any being then dead taking "the share their parent would have taken if living." Mr. Albery submits that those words show that the real truth of the matter is that the gift to the brothers and sisters was intended to be contingent on their surviving the widow. I feel unable to accept that submission. In my judgment, the case is really governed by the decision of the Privy Council in Greenwood v. Greenwood.[1] Apart from that authority, I should have come to the same conclusion, namely, that this gift was prima facie vested and the subsequent words are not sufficient to turn that vested gift into a gift contingent on surviving the widow.

Much greater difficulty arises on that part of the gift which gave something to the children of the brothers and sisters who do not survive the widow. There are three claimants. The first class of claimant, represented by the plaintiff, submits that, on the true construction of this will, it is a gift to the brothers and sisters who survive the testator, with a gift in favour of the children of the brothers and sisters so surviving the testator but dying before the tenant for life; in other words, it is a true clause of substitution. The original class is the brothers and sisters who survive the testator, and the persons in that class are divested of their previously vested gifts if they die in the lifetime of the widow leaving children. That is the first contention.

The second contention, put forward by Mr. Albery on behalf of the first defendant, is that the gift should be read in this sense: that it is a gift to all the brothers and sisters alive at the date of the will, but that class is reduced in this way, that, in the case of those who are not alive at the date of the death of the tenant for life leaving children, their children step into their shoes. That is what has been called a clear substitutional gift.

Mr. Hawkins, in the third edition of his book on Wills, has described that type of gift at page 297 in this way. "Besides "gifts to issue purely substitutional, engrafted on a gift to "children as a class, and independent gifts to children and issue "of children concurrently, there is a third class of cases, in which "the substitution, if it can be called such, takes place before

[1] (1939) 55 T.L.R. 607.

" the members of the primary class are ascertained, but on the " other hand takes place only as regards those who at the date " of the will had the capacity of becoming members of the class. " Thus the issue of children dying in the testator's lifetime are " entitled, but the issue of children dead at the date of the will " are excluded."

The third contention, which is submitted by Mr. Winterbotham on behalf of the second defendant, is that on its true construction there are here two original gifts—that is to say, there is a gift to brothers and sisters alive at the death of the testator, and an independent gift to the children of those brothers and sisters who are not alive at the date of distribution, that class comprising brothers and sisters who have died at any time, whether before or after the date of the will or during the subsistence of the life interest. Those are the three contentions.

This type of gift has been the subject-matter of discussion in a very large number of authorities, several of which, very properly, have been cited to me. I think that it is only necessary to refer to one or two, and that it will be convenient to do so at this stage of my judgment before returning to the language of the will. The first case is the well-known one of Loring v. Thomas.[2] I do not propose to read the headnote, because I am referring to this authority solely for some observations of a general character which were made during the course of his judgment by Kindersley V.-C.: " Now, of course, the question is " one entirely of intention, and it is obvious that in cases of " this kind a testator may mean to include as objects of his " bounty, or he may mean to exclude, the issue of the pre-" deceased children."

He had already defined the term " predeceased children " as signifying those of the first generation, " who were dead at " the date of the will." Then he says: " When a testator directs " that issue shall represent or stand in the place of or be sub-" stituted for a deceased child, and take the share which their " parent would have taken if living, he may intend such " representation or substitution to apply only to the case of a " child dying subsequently to the date of his will and before the " time of his own death; or he may mean it to extend also to " the case of a child who was already dead at the date of the " will. The solution of the question, which of the two he intended, " must of course depend on the language he has used in directing " such representation or substitution. He may use language of " such restricted import as to be inapplicable to any children " but such as were living at the date of the will. But, if he " uses language so wide and general as to be no less applicable " to a predeceased child than to a child living at the date of " the will, then the direction as to such representation or sub-" stitution must be held to embrace both." The whole of that passage was cited with approval by Lord Macnaghten in the House of Lords in Barraclough v. Cooper,[3] that case being reported only as a note to the case of In re Lambert.[4] I will continue with the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor: "Before I "proceed to examine in detail the language of this will, I will "make one or two preliminary observations which (although "they are little better than truisms) it will be useful to bear in "mind, not only in considering the terms of this will but also "with reference to some of the decided cases bearing on the "question.

"And, first, I would observe that, with reference to a bequest "to the children of A, there is this obvious distinction between "a child of A living at the date of the will and a predeceased "child of A, that the former is one of those whom the testator "intends to benefit by the bequest, whereas the latter not only "cannot take under such a bequest but he is not intended by "the testator to benefit, for no one intends to make a bequest "in favour of a dead person. If, therefore, a testator, in "directing that the issue of a deceased child shall represent or "stand in the place of their parent, uses language importing "that they shall take the share which he intended for the "parent, of course the issue of a predeceased child cannot be "included, because the testator could not have intended to give "any share to a child then already dead.

"On the other hand, I would observe that a predeceased child "of A and a child of A living at the date of the will stand "upon the same footing in this respect: that not only they are "both equally children of A, but they both equally answer the "description of children of A who would, if they were living at "the testator's death, have been entitled to a share under a "bequest to the children of A. That description is merely "hypothetical it speaks not of what will happen, or even of what "may happen, but only of what would have happened upon a "certain hypothesis; and of course putting a hypothetical case "does not at all involve the assumption that the hypothesis is "true, or even that it is possible. Suppose a testator, having by "his will made a bequest to the children of A, were to add to "this: one child of A (Thomas) is already dead, and I direct that "his issue shall represent him and stand in his place, and shall "be entitled to the same share which Thomas would have been "entitled to if living at my decease. Surely that language "would be perfectly correct and appropriate. Thomas, though "already dead, and therefore incapable of taking a share, and "not intended to take a share, would, upon the hypothesis of "his being alive at the testator's death, have been entitled to "a share under the bequest to the children of A, and the "testator would be correctly speaking of the share which Thomas "would have been entitled to upon that hypothesis, although "the hypothesis is impossible."

The only other authority to which I desire to refer on this part of the case is the more recent case in the House of Lords of Miller v. Gerrard.[5] The headnote reads: "A "testatrix died in 1944, having by her trust, disposition and "settlement, made in 1942, directed her trustees to divide the "residue of her estate 'equally between my sisters . . . ; And "'it is hereby declared that in the event of any of my said "'sisters . . . who may have predeceased me, leaving lawful "'issue, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares "'original and accruing which their parent would have taken "'by survivance, and the share of any of my said sisters . . . "'dying without leaving lawful issue shall be divided among the "'survivors of them and the lawful issue of any of them as may "'have died before me leaving such issue in equal shares per "'stirpes.' At the date of the execution of this document the "testatrix had six sisters living; a seventh had died leaving a "daughter who survived the testatrix:—Held, (per Viscount "Simon, Lord Macmillan and Lord du Parcq, Lord Thankerton "and Lord Simonds dissenting) that the daughter of the deceased "sister was not entitled to a share of the residue, since, on the "true construction of the trust disposition and settlement, the "class referred to was that of the sisters alive at the date of its "execution." That was a Scottish case and a Scottish will, but the applicable law was treated in the House of Lords as being equally appropriate to a Scottish or English will. It appears that the majority of the House, influenced I think by the presence of the words "said sisters" in those two places, decided that the testatrix was intending to benefit a class of sisters alive at the date of the will, that class, of course, being subject to diminution by death before the death of the testatrix; that the gift over was only of those shares intended for the original class of sisters alive at the date of the will; that the testatrix did not intend to benefit any sisters dead at the date of her will; and that, therefore, the issue of sisters dead at the date of the will could not claim under the second branch of the gift.

Lord Macmillan read with approval the passage from the judgment of Kindersley V.-C., part of which I have already read. I think that the only other passage to which I need refer is that in the opinion of Lord du Parcq,[6] who, after referring to a passage in the seventh edition of Jarman on Wills, which, I may note, has been excised from the eighth edition, says: "I am "happy to think that no 'rule' is laid down in Loring v. "Thomas[7] which prevents a judge from arriving at a testator's "meaning by considering the words which the testator has used, "read as a whole, or from giving effect to clear language in "a will. My noble and learned friend Lord Macmillan has "already quoted from the judgment of Kindersley V.-C. the one " proposition for which Loring v. Thomas [8] is an authority. In the " case of Wardlaw's Trustees [9] the Lord President concisely and " accurately stated the effect of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment " when he said: ' The pith and substance of the observations of " ' the learned Vice-Chancellor are that you must take the " ' language of the testator in its natural sense and discover from " ' it whether the issue of a parent who predeceased the execution " ' of the will are excluded; or whether the language is wide " ' enough to include them.' So understood, the rule (if rule " it should be called) in Loring v. Thomas [10] need never strain " the judicial conscience, and will not conflict with what has so " often been declared to be the paramount rule of construction: " it is, as Lord Fleming said in Wardlaw's case,[11] ' just an " ' example of the more general rule that the intention of the " ' testator must be derived from the actual language used by " ' him.' I will only add that when the decision of your Lord- " ships' House in Barraclough's case [12] was cited to the Court " of Appeal in England, perhaps for the first time, and while it " was as yet unreported, in the case of In re Cope; Cross v. " Cross,[13] the court (Cozens-Hardy M.R. and Buckley and " Kennedy L.JJ.) rightly held themselves free to decide the " particular question before them upon the precise words of the " will, and reversed a decision founded upon a similarity of " language to that of the will in Loring v. Thomas.[14] ' It would " ' be erroneous,' said Buckley L.J., ' or misleading, to deal with " ' this case by reading first the will in Loring v. Thomas [14] and " ' then seeing how this will differs from that will.' "

With those observations of Kindersley V.-C. and the House of Lords to guide me, I return to a consideration of this will. It seems to me that there would have been much to be said for the contention of Mr. Lazarus, that this is really a gift to the brothers and sisters who survive the testator with a strictly substitutional gift in favour of the issue of those brothers and sisters who survive the testator but die before the tenant for life; but I have a difficulty about accepting this view, having regard to the words " the children of any being then dead," which plainly means dead at the date of distribution on the death of the widow, " taking the share their parents would have taken if then " living." If Mr. Lazarus' construction is right, it would have been quite unnecessary to use any words of condition. The words would have begun " if living," importing a hypothetical condition. If that be limited to brothers and sisters who survive the testator, there is no need to use those words. It would have been sufficient to say: " The children of any being then dead " taking their parents' share." Therefore, it seems to be clear, having regard to the use of those words—" the share that parent " would have taken if living "—that the testator was bringing in as objects of his bounty a class of brothers and sisters who predeceased him, because it was only of them that it was said that they would have taken if living.

But the real problem—and it is a problem of great difficulty —which I have to consider is whether the class of predeceasing brothers and sisters includes those who die before the date of the will. I confine myself entirely to the language of this will, and it seems to me that that problem is answered entirely by the words of this will. This will means one of two things. It first may mean " equally between all my brothers and sisters, the " children of any of my said or before mentioned brothers and " sisters being dead taking their parent's share." That is one way of reading it. If it is so read, then, in my judgment, the answer must be that the issue of those dead at the date of the will do not take; because if the original class is " all my brothers and sisters " the testator cannot have been intending to benefit the brothers or sisters dead at the date of the will. Taking as the following words, " the children of any of the before mentioned class," it necessarily follows that no such children can predicate of themselves that their parent was in the former class and can come into the latter. Therefore, the children of brothers and sisters who die before the date of the will are necessarily excluded. That is one construction.

The alternative construction is to read it in this way: " Equally between all my brothers and sisters who survive me, " the children of any of my brothers and sisters who are dead " at the date of distribution taking the share which their parents " would have taken if they had been alive." In other words, the word " any " does not refer back to the word " all " in the former class but is a new and more comprehensive class, namely, the children of all my brothers and sisters regardless of when they die. Which of those two views is correct? I confess that commonsense would seem to direct that the testator probably intended to indicate the latter, for there seems no good sense in cutting out the nephews and nieces merely because their parents were dead before the date of the will. But I am not sure that that is a safe guide to the construction of this will. The words are ambiguous. The authorities show that the cases fall on one side or other of the line, and there are very fine distinctions in them. On the whole, I think that the true way of reading this is: " All my brothers and sisters the children of any of my " said or before mentioned brothers and sisters," and so on, for two reasons. First, I think that the word " any " grammatically refers back to the word " all," and that therefore the class of children who take can only be derived from the earlier class, that is the class of all their brothers and sisters, those being brothers and sisters in existence at the date of the will. That is only a slight indication. There is another indication, admittedly only slight, to be found in the earlier gift of residue. That gift is to three named sisters with a proviso to "the children of any sister being then dead," and so on. The word "any" in that context is used quite plainly as the words "said" or "before mentioned." In my judgment, the testator was using the word "any" in that sense in this will. Accordingly, in my judgment, the nephews and nieces of brothers and sisters dead at the date of the will do not take.

One further point remains to be decided, and that is whether the class of nephews and nieces who take take as joint tenants or as tenants in common. There is no doubt that the usual rule where there is a gift to a compound class is that double words of severance are required; and it is claimed that there are no double words of severance here. Reliance has been placed on the decision of Simonds J. in In re Froy.[15] After considering a number of cases, he said: "I must observe that Fry J. had "Penny v. Clarke [16] and In re Sibley's Trusts [17] before him when "he decided as he did the case of Crosthwaite v. Dean,[18] and "I think I am bound to hold, as he did, that double words of "severance are not necessary where you have a gift in shorthand "such as he had there, and as I have here. It is not a case in "which, a compound class being the object of the testator's "bounty, the testator has gone on to say that the children of "children, that is to say, the substitutionary class, are to take "between them their parents' share. Where that is said, the "testator has defined, and is presumed to have defined com-"pletely, what is the nature of the interest which they take. "He has said they are to take their parents' share; he has not "gone on to use words which import they are to take as tenants "in common and not as joint tenants."

Looking at the words of this will, I cannot come to the conclusion that these words can be described as in shorthand, in the manner meant by Simonds J. It is perfectly true that there is no direct gift to the children, although the word "taken," I think, imports a gift to them. It would have been perfectly easy for the testator to have said: "Equally between all my "brothers and sisters the children of any being then dead taking "equally between them the share their parents would have "taken." I can find no word of severance here in the gift to the children. Accordingly, in my judgment, they take as joint tenants.

Therefore, I shall declare that a share of the investments representing the sum of £1,000 has fallen into the estate of the testator's deceased sister, Naomi Brooke. I shall also declare that the class of brothers and sisters of the testator whose children are entitled to participate in the said investments consists of those who were living at the date of his will but predeceased the widow. Finally, I declare that the children of

The plaintiff, a clerk of works at a building site where the defendants were erecting a school for his employers, was, in the course of his employment, hurrying down a narrow passage, when he struck his head on a scaffold pole, which protruded horizontally across the passage, and received a serious injury. The passageway was one of the means of access to the buildings and the plaintiff was aware of the presence of the scaffold and of the danger; although he had not been down the passage or had occasion to visit that part of the site for five or six weeks he knew that the scaffold had not been removed. In an action for damages by the plaintiff, in which it was conceded that the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendants was that of invitee and invitor, and in which the plaintiff alleged negligence at common law and breach of regulations 4 and 5 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948:—

Held, that, assuming that the scaffold was an unusual danger, although there might be cases where there was such a lapse between the point of time when an invitee had full knowledge of a danger and when he next went on to the premises as an invitee that the knowledge of the invitee on the first occasion could not be relied upon by the invitor without any further warning, the question whether a fresh warning should be given must be a question of fact, depending on all the circumstances of the case; that, since the danger in the present case was so open and apparent, and the invitee had been well acquainted with it a mere five or six weeks before, it was impossible to say that an ordinary careful invitor would regard it as reasonably necessary to give the invitee a fresh warning; and that, therefore, the plaintiff's claim based on common law negligence failed.

WINGROVE v. PRESTIGE & CO. LD.

Held, further, that the duty imposed by the regulations on a contractor who erected or altered a scaffold did not give a right against the contractor to any person who suffered through a non-compliance of those regulations but was limited by the words of regulation 4, "having regard to the purpose or purposes for which "the scaffold is designed," to a duty towards persons using the scaffold; that the words "sufficient safe means of access shall be "provided to every place at which any person has . . . . to work" in regulation 5 accordingly meant access to a place of work by persons who had to work on a scaffold and not by persons whose work was unrelated to the purpose for which a scaffold was erected, and that, therefore, the defendants owed the plaintiff no duty under the regulations. The action accordingly failed.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, a man of 63 years of age who had 50 years' experience of the building trade, was employed by the Middlesex County Council as clerk of works at a building site where the defendants, building contractors, were erecting a primary school for the Middlesex County Council. On the south side of the buildings, all of which were in course of erection, there was a block of ancillary buildings between the walls of which and the playground wall a passageway, 9 ft. 9 ins wide and 9 ft. 5 ins. long, led from the kitchen and sloped up to level yards; this passageway was a way in and out of the building site, and beyond it there was a temporary service road. The whole site was small, the distance from the south wall of the ancillary building to the south side of the dining room in the main building being a little over 15 yards.

Two or three months before June 29, 1950, the defendants, in the course of the building operations, had erected a scaffold round the ancillary buildings; as the brickwork was completed the scaffold was taken down, but, to act as a support for further scaffolding which would be required later on, a bridle and a ledger pole, tubular scaffold poles, were left extending horizontally about 5 ft. 7½ ins. from the ground across the bottom of the passageway leading from the kitchen to the yards. When they had been put up the plaintiff noticed that these poles had been placed across the opening and that they were at the height at which somebody might bang his head, and he complained of the danger to the defendants' foreman. The poles were left in position and no steps, such as lagging or painting with white paint, were taken to minimize the danger. About five or six weeks before June 29, 1950, the builders were taken off the brickwork at the south side of the site and were put on to work at the north end of the main building.

On June 28 the builders returned to work at the south end of the site, and on June 29, in broad daylight, when the plaintiff was in the ancillary buildings looking at window frames he looked out and saw two of the workmen about, as he thought, to "sneak "off." He hurried out to intercept them, going by the passage-way, and having forgotten about the pole banged his left forehead hard against it. Although the plaintiff had not been down that passageway, nor had occasion to inspect it, for about five to six weeks, he had frequently used the passageway when the builders were working on the south part of the site and was well acquainted with the danger, and, at the time in question, knew that the scaffold had not been removed.

The plaintiff was a one-eyed man, and as a result of the bang on his forehead his other eye was so injured that he lost the sight in it, and became totally blind.

He claimed damages against the defendants, alleging that his accident and the injury to his eye were caused by breaches by them of their statutory duty under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations—in particular that, in breach of regulations 4 and 5 [1] no sufficient safe means of access was provided to the place where he had to work, in that the passageway, owing to the presence of the scaffolding tube, was not a sufficient safe means of access to the kitchen block or from the kitchen block to those parts of the building site to which it afforded an access. He also alleged negligence at common law, in that, among other things, the defendants placed a dangerous obstacle, namely, the scaffolding pole, across the passageway which they knew or ought to have known was likely to be used by him in the course of his work, without giving any warning to him.

The defendants denied liability; they alleged that the plaintiff's injuries were solely caused or contributed to by his own negligence in failing to look where he was going.

Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and, further or alternatively, at common law, claiming that his relationship to the contractors occupying the site was, as a matter of law, that of an invitee because he was engaged on matters of business common to him and to them. There can be no doubt that the relationship between the defendants and the plaintiff was that of invitor and invitee, and that the plaintiff was an invitee. There is, I suppose, no authority so often relied on and quoted as Indermaur v. Dames [1] and the statement there of the measure of duty of an invitor to an invitee. It has recently been considered by the House of Lords in London Graving Dock Co. Ld. v. Horton.[2] There it was laid down that where a man is an invitee claiming against an invitor who is not his employer, the invitee's knowledge of an unusual risk exonerated the invitor from liability for damage which the invitee might sustain, because, in short, the duty of the invitor was, as Lord Porter pointed out, to use reasonable care to prevent damage to an invitee through the presence of an unusual danger of which the invitor knew or ought to know, but of which the invitee would not know, he using reasonable care for his own safety. Lord Porter said [3]: "Even "if there is unusual danger, the duty to use reasonable care to "prevent damage may be performed by notice, lighting or "guarding, and the recognition that the invitor may fulfil the "obligations imposed upon him by notice or lighting indicates "that adequate warning to the invitee may be a compliance with "the duty which is owed by the invitor." Towards the end of his judgment, after dealing with a certain number of cases, Lord Porter said of them [4]: "None seems to me conclusive of "the matter under discussion, and though natural sympathy "must make the inclination lean towards a desire to compensate "the respondent for his injury, the true principle is, in my "opinion, that a full appreciation of the danger on the part of "the invitee and a continuance of his work with that knowledge "is sufficient to free the invitor from liability for damage "occasioned by the insecurity of the premises to which resort "is made."

Giving judgment to the like effect, Lord Normand said [5]: "When there is already knowledge, notice or warning will have "no effect and the omission of it can do no harm. . . . The "knowledge must, therefore, be full knowledge of the nature and "the extent of the danger." Then he went on: "In the present "case the judge has found that the plaintiff had full knowledge "of the nature and the extent of the peril, and the finding is "beyond doubt warranted by the evidence, which shows that the "plaintiff had before his accident complained of the same defects "in the staging as were proved at the trial." Lord Normand, when considering the question whether the principle in Donoghue v. Stevenson [6] was applicable to such circumstances as Singleton L.J. had certainly suggested,[7] said [8]: "And in any event "there was in the present case an opportunity for inspection, "both by the plaintiff's employers and by the plaintiff himself, "so that the plaintiff actually knew as the result of his inspection "the very defects of which he now complains."

Lord Oaksey, considering the matter as one between invitor and invitee, observed [9]: "The duty of an invitor to an invitee is, "in my opinion, to give him a fair warning of any danger on the "premises which he cannot be expected to foresee. Premises "inevitably contain a great variety of dangers, some great, some "slight, some usual, some unusual, and it is, in my opinion, a "question of fact whether the danger is so slight or so usual that "no warning is needed or so great or so unusual that the invitee "with the actual knowledge of the premises which he is known "by the invitor to possess ought, in the opinion of an ordinarily "careful invitor, to be warned of it. The words of Atkin J. "in Lucy v. Bawden,[10] approved by your Lordships' House in "Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society,[11] appear "to me directly applicable mutatis mutandis to the facts "of the present case: 'The danger, if any, was patent to "'everyone, and the plaintiff gave evidence that she herself had "'complained to the defendant's agent about it.'" So it was held in that case that, invitee though he was, the plaintiff could not recover upon the law as between invitor and invitee.

Assuming for the moment that this ledger or bridle across the way (which was one of the ways into and out of the site) was an unusual danger, none the less two questions remain: (1) had the plaintiff himself full knowledge of it?; (2) was it, if unusual, so unusual that the invitee, with actual knowledge of the premises which he was known by the defendants to possess, ought in the opinion of an ordinarily careful invitor to be warned of it? It is perfectly clear that the plaintiff had full knowledge of the presence of these poles and had complained of them because of their situation and the height at which they were placed. That is undeniably the fact up to the time when, five or six weeks before, the bricklayers had gone to work at the north end, and for the time being had left this part of this small site. The argument addressed to me is that no doubt—and the plaintiff has told us so—he knew and appreciated the danger of those poles thus situate up to the time when the men were taken away from that portion of the site and moved to the north end to continue work there, but, it is said, because there was a lapse of five or six weeks, during which time he had no particular reason to go to the south end of the site and, according to him, did not go there to inspect any work, that knowledge was not knowledge which lasted or could be relied on six weeks later at the time of the accident. I agree with the argument to this extent, there may be cases where a lapse of time between the point of time when an invitee has full knowledge of a danger—and for the moment I will assume an unusual danger—and that when he next goes to the premises as an invitee, is such that the knowledge which he had on the first occasion cannot be relied on to protect the invitor without any further warning. To give an example: if I call for a plumber to come to my house to do some work this year in December, and I warn him of two stairs at the end of a passageway which are rather unapparent and may be dangerous if he does not know of their existence, and if he does not have any occasion to come to my premises again for another 12 months, notwithstanding that he had knowledge of that danger 12 months previously when he visited my house, as an ordinarily careful invitor I ought to give him a fresh warning. I agree that it must be a question of fact in each case, in all the circumstances, whether a fresh warning should be given by an ordinarily careful invitor.

I cannot think that that is so in this case, much as I should like to. The plaintiff was a highly experienced clerk of works. He had spent 50 years of his life on building sites. As a clerk of works it was his business to know what work was going on at any part of the site at any time and to go at any time and inspect work on any part of the site. He knew full well what part of the scaffold had been dismantled and what had not; he said himself that before the accident he knew that these poles had not been removed. I find that in those circumstances, where there was a mere lapse of such a period of time as five or six weeks and where the danger of such an accident as occurred was so open and apparent to all, it is impossible to say that an ordinarily careful invitor would regard it as reasonably necessary to give a further warning, the invitee being an experienced clerk of works who had complained in no uncertain terms about the presence of these poles, and who certainly for something like one-and-a-half to two months had daily been about this part of the site successfully stooping to pass under these poles. It would be unreasonable, it seems to me, to say that he required a fresh warning about their presence merely because for a few weeks he had been attending more particularly to work at the other end of this quite small site where, having regard to the state of the work, the poles must have been observable from many points.

I have assumed for this purpose that these poles constituted an unusual danger, but in my opinion it is impossible to say that the plaintiff had not full knowledge of this danger on the day and at the time of the accident. That for the moment he forgot it does not necessarily mean that he had not knowledge, a continuing and full knowledge. Every one of us, in just such circumstances, with full knowledge and familiarity with a danger like that, can on occasions absent-mindedly forget it and bang his head severely. I am bound to confess that I do it myself, and I venture to think it is a thing which might very easily be done by any one of us. For that reason I think that the plaintiff, unfortunately for him, cannot successfully claim at common law under the principle enunciated in Indermaur v. Dames.[12]

So far I have assumed that this is proved to be an unusual danger on a building site. [His Lordship considered the evidence on this matter and continued:] The only way in which it may be put that it was unusual is because the presence of the poles at the height at which they were was not sufficiently indicated, and attention was not sufficiently drawn to their presence by their being dabbed with white paint or lagged or having something hung from them to call attention to the fact that they were there. On the whole, the conclusion to which I have come about that part of the case is that such a precaution as dabbing with some white paint or lime to call attention to a pole, or hanging a piece of something from it, is certainly adopted in public places and is a usual precaution to take to warn people, such as ordinary passers-by unaccustomed to building sites, that there is a scaffold pole at this height, but I am left in considerable doubt whether it really is a thing which can be said to be usual on a building site. My final conclusion is that it is often done, even on a building site, and often not done.

I now turn to the claim under the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948. Here various complaints were made originally, but what now remains is a complaint that there was a failure to comply with regulation 5, enforceable, it is said, against the defendants by virtue of regulation 4. This is a matter of construction of the regulations and by no means, it seems to me, an easy matter, although I think that what emerges is eventually plainly one way. In the definition provision (regulation 3 (2)) a scaffold is said to mean: "... any temporary "structure on or from which persons perform work in connexion "with an operation to which these regulations apply, and any "temporary structure which enables persons to obtain access to "or which enables materials to be taken to any place at which "such work is performed, and includes any working platform, "gangway, run, ladder or step-ladder (other than an independent "ladder or step-ladder which does not form part of such a struc-"ture) together with any guard-rail, toe-board or other safeguards "and all fixings, but does not include a lifting appliance or a "structure used merely to support such an appliance or to "support other machinery or plant."

Regulation 4 is headed "Obligations under Regulations." It reads: "It shall be the duty of every contractor and employer "of workmen who is undertaking any of the operations to which "these regulations apply (i) to comply with such of the require-"ments of regulations 5–30 ... as affect any workman employed

Hilbery J.

" by him . . . ; (ii) . . . and it shall be the duty of every con-" tractor and employer of workmen who erects or alters any " scaffold to comply with such of the requirements of regulations " 5–30 as relate to the erection or alteration of scaffolds having " regard to the purpose or purposes for which the scaffold is " designed at the time of erection or alteration." It is, of course, conceded, as it is bound to be, that the plaintiff, not being employed by the defendants, was not a workman employed by the defendants who would be affected by a non-compliance by the defendants with the requirements of regulations 5 to 30 under paragraph (i). The plaintiff relies on paragraph (ii). It is said that the words of that paragraph, being in the form in which they are and not limited in a way which would confine their operation to the situation as it would exist between a contractor and his servant, give a right against a contractor who erects or alters a scaffold to any person who suffers through a non-compliance with any of the regulations 5 to 30.

Regulation 5 reads: " Suitable and sufficient scaffolds shall be " provided for all work that cannot safely be done on or from the " ground or from part of the building, or from part of a per-" manent structure or from a ladder or other available means of " support, and sufficient safe means of access shall so far as is " reasonably practicable be provided to every place at which any " person has at any time to work." Reliance is put upon the last words of that regulation, and it is said that the defendants in erecting this scaffold broke that regulation in so far as it requires that sufficient and " safe means of access shall so far as is " reasonably practicable be provided to every place at which any " person has at any time to work." I am afraid I cannot do justice to the way Mr. Bassett put it, but he said that those words have to be connected with the subject-matter of regulations 5 to 30, particularly with regard to the erection or alteration which is dealt with in the first part of regulation 5, that is to say, the scaffold must not be erected at a point where it is sited so as to result in its interfering with a safe means of access. I find myself quite unable to give that construction to these regulations as they are worded. In the first place, it appears to me that the words relied on in regulation 4 indicate the limit, and indeed define the limit, of the general duty imposed on the person erecting or altering a scaffold. Regulations 5 to 30 are regulations to protect from danger as far as possible a man using a scaffold. The words in regulation 5 " and sufficient safe means of access " shall so far as is reasonably practicable be provided to every " place at which any person has at any time to work," must mean, it seems to me, a safe means of access to a place where a person has to work on the scaffold; otherwise there would be no relation to the purpose or purposes for which the scaffold is erected or designed.

Furthermore, regulation 5 cannot be intended to put on a contractor who merely erects a scaffold on a site, which may be a very extensive site with many means of access to work at various points, the duty to provide safe means of access to every form of work at every part of that site. He is there to construct a scaffold, and to construct a scaffold which shall comply with the regulations having regard to the purpose for which it is being erected. That is his positive duty. When it is said, if I may put it shortly, that he must site the scaffold so that he does not interfere with the means of access or obstruct the means of access, I call attention to the fact that these latter words of regulation 5 impose a positive duty; they are mandatory—"sufficient safe means of access shall so far as is reasonably "practicable be provided." They must be provided. Those words are inapt to provide that there is a duty not to interfere with what would otherwise be a safe means of access. The provision of a safe means of access is positive; the interference with what is a safe means and has been provided as a safe means is an act, and to forbid the doing of that is to forbid an interference with what is already provided; but these words do not do that. That may seem to be a nice point, but I am trying to discover what these words are really intended to mean and what is the extent of the duty which they are intended to impose.

Lastly, they are words which are embedded in and part of regulations which in detail deal with the construction of a scaffold. If they had been intended to put on the builder of a scaffold on any site the duty to provide safe means of access to work quite apart from the scaffold but adjacent to the scaffold, or in any way leading up to the scaffold—I do not know how they could have put a limit on that—section 26 of the Factories Act, 1937, is a model of how it can be done. I am not using that word in a laudatory sense, but in section 26 it is said: "There "shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, be provided and main-"tained safe means of access to every place at which any person "has at any time to work." If this regulation had been intended to extend the duty placed on a contractor erecting a scaffold in the way in which Mr. Bassett has argued it should be interpreted, then it could have been said quite simply that the scaffold must be so erected or placed as not to interfere with safe means of access to or from work on the site. The regulation does not say that, and I am quite unable to find in the circumstances that the plaintiff can succeed on either branch of the law upon which reliance has been placed.

As I said before, this is a hard case because of the disastrous consequences to the plaintiff. If I had held that there was a breach of the regulations or a failure on the part of the defendants to discharge the obligations placed upon them at common law on the principle of Indermaur v. Dames,[12] I should have assessed the plaintiff's damages in gross at £3,500; but I should have felt, in the face of his evidence, that it was impossible to say that he was not at least as much at fault in not looking out for what was plain and apparent right on his eye-line, and in not avoiding it as all the other men had done, and that at least he must take half of the responsibility. I should therefore have said, if I had been able to find for him, that he should recover £1,750. As it is, I am bound to give judgment for the defendants.

Failure of an assisted person to give notice to another party to the proceedings under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 15 (2), does not disentitle him from receiving legal aid, and his liability for costs is limited by section 2 (2) (e) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, notwithstanding his failure to give such notice.

APPLICATION for costs.

The plaintiff was a legally assisted person who brought an action for damages for personal injuries against the defendants, his employers. Although a legal aid certificate had been granted to the plaintiff on June 9, 1951, before he commenced proceedings (his disposable income being assessed at £238 a year and his contribution at £41), solicitors for the plaintiffs had failed to serve notice as required by regulation 15 (2) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950.[1]

The plaintiff failed in his action and counsel for the defendants asked for judgment with costs.

Barry Chedlow, for the plaintiff, submitted that, although there had been a failure to serve the notice, the certificate had been granted, and the plaintiff was a legally assisted person within the meaning of the Act.

KING v. T. AND W. FARMILOE LD.

John Thompson, for the defendants, submitted that they had no knowledge that a legal aid certificate had been granted, and were therefore entitled to their costs. It was the duty of persons to whom legal aid certificates were granted to give notice.

GERRARD J. said that the plaintiff was entitled to legal aid under regulation 2 (1) of the regulations as he was a person to whom a legal aid certificate had been granted. Regulation 15 (2) provided that whenever an assisted person became a party to proceedings his solicitor should forthwith serve all other parties with notice in Form V1. There was, however, no sanction provided in the regulations and it appeared to him, looking at regulation 15 as a whole, that the real object of the notice was to enable a party opposed, who was not an assisted perton, to put in an affidavit exhibiting thereto a statement of his own means. A failure to serve the notice might entitle a party at some stage to say that he had had no notice, and had therefore been prevented from putting forward evidence with regard to his own means, or from cross-examining the other party with regard to his means. He did not see how failure to give a notice which seemed, on reading regulation 17, to be part of the machinery for operating an inquiry under section 2 (2) (e) of the Act, could invalidate the plaintiff's entitlement to legal aid. The plaintiff's liability for costs was accordingly limited by the terms of section 2 (2) (e) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

* SHEPHARD AND ANOTHER v. CARTWRIGHT AND ANOTHER.

Advancement — Father's use of children's names to help business activities—Allotments to children of shares in companies of which father a promoter—Subsequent sale of same shares by father—Signature by children of documents on allotment and sale without knowing their nature—Children unaware both of allotment and of sale—Later purchase by father of properties and creation of accounts for children's benefit of which children told—Allotments of shares not advancements.

Shares in companies promoted by a father were allotted to his two younger children without their knowledge—they unquestioningly signing whatever he told them to sign—and subsequently (also without their knowledge) sold by him, under authorities signed by them. They did not know what they were signing or realise what the transactions were or even that they had taken place. The father had for long used his children's names to help him in his business activities.

He also acquired in each child's name a number of house properties of which he informed them, indicating that they were intended as provisions for them: and he formed an estates company in the books of which each child was credited with about £50,000 on loan account. By his will he made specific bequests and left annuities and bequeathed the residue to his three children.

After the testator's death the two children learned, because of the investigation of his books and papers, of the original allotments of the shares to themselves and of his subsequent disposal of them: and they made claims against his estate which involved treating those allotments as advancements:—

Held, (1) that the objection that records of oral declarations subsequently made by a deceased father tending to negative a gift were not admissible in evidence, did not apply to subsequent events, as, e.g., in the present case, the way in which the shares and the proceeds of their sale were subsequently dealt with: and that those subsequent events, in so far as they threw light on the father's state of mind when the allotments were made, were part of the original transaction because intimately connected with it and were therefore admissible; Grey v. Grey (1677) 2 Swanst. 594, Marshal v. Crutwell (1875) L.R. 20 Eq. 328 and Bone v. Pollard (1857) 24 Beav. 283 applied; In re Gooch, Gooch v. Gooch (1890) 62 L.T. 384; 6 T.L.R. 224; Sidmouth v. Sidmouth (1840) 2 Beav. 447 and Christy v. Courtenay (1849) 13 Beav. 96 considered.

(2) That since each child knew that he or she had provision made for him or her in the form of the house properties, and knew also of the loan accounts in the estates company, it was obvious that, after the estates company had come into existence and the loan accounts been created, the father could not have intended his children to be allowed to prefer further claims against him by raking back into his past transactions.

(3) That, on a consideration of the evidence as a whole and of the circumstances on both sides, the father did not, in the earlier allotments of shares any more than in the transactions with the businesses, intend to commit himself by way of out and out gifts; and that, accordingly, the two children kept what they had but could not, by appealing to earlier events, ask for more; Devoy v. Devoy (1857) 3 Sm. & G. 403 applied.

ACTION.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment:—By his will, made in December, 1946, the testator, Philip Edward Shephard, bequeathed specifically a number of properties and left annuities amounting to £1,800 a year before bequeathing the residue to his three children. During the 1930s he made a great deal of money out of building and selling small houses. In the peak year, 1933, one of the companies in which he was interested, and which had a nominal capital of £1,000, made a profit of upwards of £340,000. He died in 1949, and at the time when he made his will he still passed for a rich man, being possessed of one or more yachts, several houses in England and an estate at Montego Bay in Jamaica. After his death, however, owing to investigations of the defendant, Hedley Spain Dunk, a chartered accountant, who had been connected with some of his business affairs, had made his income tax returns, and was appointed an executor, his estate was sworn for probate purposes at £94,000 gross with a net estate of nil, a result due to the claims of two of his children which were the subject of the present inquiry.

In April, 1950, two of the executors—namely, the defendant Dunk and Joseph Osmond Cartwright, the testator's son-in-law and husband of one of the claimants—issued an originating summons asking a number of questions and couched in a form which was quite irregular. That application came before Danckwerts J. in chambers, who refused to make any order on it except to forbid the executors to admit the children's claims. Thereafter, the present action was started by writ in which two of the children were plaintiffs and two of the executors defendants; it was in form as defective as the former originating summons, and Harman J. said that, though in these days points about form were out of fashion, he must register a protest against the growing practice of ignoring the proper way of bringing claims to trial, and observed that claims of the kind then before him, which would more than exhaust an estate, could be adjudicated on only in a creditors' administration suit unless the executors admitted assets and submitted to be personally liable. The present action was not entitled in the matter of the testator's estate, nor was administration asked for, nor did the defendants decline to admit assets, nor did they plead plene administravit praeter. Altogether, almost everything was wrong which could be wrong. In particular, it was proposed that these claims should be adjudicated on in the absence of the third child, who himself claimed to be a creditor of the estate, and whose share of residue would be completely absorbed if the claims were successful. His Lordship observed that, no doubt, executors properly represented an estate, but that it could not, in his judgment, be right that the only defendants in such a case as the present should be, first, the husband of one of the claimants, and, secondly, the accountant whose researches were the origins of the claims and without whom, indeed, it would never have occurred to the claimants that they had any claims against a father who had already treated them with great generosity.

It seemed to his Lordship, however, that the matter could be put right by causing the writ and statement of claim to be amended and by making a general administration decree together with a number of special accounts and inquiries designed to investigate the claims made or pending. Such of them as related to the plaintiffs he treated as having been adjourned to him before certificate under the usual power for that purpose. His Lordship also directed that the decree be served on the third son, Philip Edward Shephard junior, who attended the hearing by counsel in opposition to the claimants. All that was done.

The claims made were similar, and of a remarkable character. They rested on what was called "the presumption of advancement" existing between a father and his children, and were said to arise out of gifts made to each child in 1929, or thereabouts, the making of which had been disclosed only by a recent search through the father's books and papers after his death. Against the alleged gifts each claimant was willing to bring into account other sums or shares placed in his or her name from time to time, so that each claim was for the balance of a running account. [His Lordship observed that he had never seen the presumption of advancement called into that particular service.]

The testator had an insurance business registered under the Business Names Act in the name of "R. D. & P. E. Shephard." Those were two of his children, Philip, born in 1901 and David (one of the claimants), born in 1913. Also registered as a partner was his daughter Winifred (Mrs. Cartwright, the other claimant) born in 1906. The testator also started at least two other businesses, one called Townsend & Page, which stood in Winifred's name and a furnishing business registered as the property of David and one Grimes and subsequently converted into a limited company. Thus, the testator for long used his children's names to help his own business activities, about which David and Winifred were not consulted and knew nothing.

In 1918 the testator's first wife died, and in 1919 he married a woman by whom he had no issue and who was still living at the date of these proceedings.

In 1929 the testator went into the business of speculative building with one Leo Mayer. They promoted five small private companies, each having a capital of about £1,000 which the two promoters divided between themselves and their families. Philip, the eldest son, was by this time of age and helped his father in business; Winifred was of age, and David, an infant, had just left school and was employed in the building business. Neither Winifred nor David knew anything about the allotments made in their names.

By 1934 the venture was an immense success, and the testator and Mayer promoted a public company to acquire their interests, called the Ideal Building and Land Development Co. Ltd., which, by agreement dated May 16, 1934, agreed to acquire all the shares in the five private companies for £700,000, of which £300,000 was to be satisfied in cash and £400,000 in shares, the latter being entirely attributable to acquiring the shares in the main house-building company, New Ideal Homesteads, Ld. Half the consideration went to each family, so that there was payable, as the price of shares standing in Winifred's name, £26,737 10s. cash and 40,000 shares of £1, and, as the price of those in David's name, £45,937 10s. cash and 40,000 like shares. David and Winifred signed this agreement, David also witnessing Mayer's signature; but in these proceedings, each of them denied knowing of its existence, saying that they were accustomed to signing documents for their father and ready to sign anything that he put before them without inquiry. In connexion with this transaction, the testator procured each claimant to sign a power of attorney covering the sale of the shares, and an authority to the public company to pay direct to the testator the cash proportion of his half of the purchase consideration. The powers of attorney were not used, but the other documents were used to authorize the testator to receive from the new company £145,000 total cash consideration which he did on May 25, 1934. The remaining £5,000 in cash was payable in respect of shares registered in the name of his wife, who apparently did not receive it. On the same day the testator paid £157,000 through the Leadenhall Street branch of Barclays Bank to his current account at the Beckenham branch, and transferred £133,000 of that to a deposit account. On May 29, however, he re-transferred the money from the deposit account to his current account, and opened a deposit account in Winifred's name for £19,277 10s. and in David's name for £42,060 5s. In these proceedings it was pointed out that that credit to David's deposit account was short by £3,877 5s. of the £45,937 10s. expressed to be due under the agreement of May 16, which it was suggested, might be explicable by a cheque for that amount drawn on the previous day—May 28, 1934—in favour of " Shephard," the payee being unidentified, but not being David. Similarly, the amount paid to the credit of Winifred's deposit account was short by £7,460 10s. of the cash expressed to be due to her under the sale agreement, which was said to be accounted for by cheques amounting to that sum drawn by the testator in favour of two accounts at Lloyds Bank at Dartford, one of which was in Winifred's name and one in that of the business of Townsend & Page before mentioned. Both accounts had been used for that business, and the payments only sufficed to clear off overdrafts and thus to close down the business.

Next, the testator sold the share consideration passing to the children. David's shares were sold first for about £88,000, which was credited to his deposit account on June 15, 1934. Winifred's shares were sold in August at a lower price for just under £60,000, which was credited to her deposit account on August 2, 1934. At some time after the deposit accounts were created, and before 1935, the testator procured from each of the two claimants a further authority requesting the bank to honour the testator's signature for withdrawals from the deposit accounts. By these means, the whole of the sums to the credit of the deposit accounts were withdrawn by the end of 1935 and employed by the testator for his own purposes. It was out of these transactions that the claims arose.

In 1935 the testator promoted a new private company called "Philip Edward Shephard Estates, Ltd.," of which he had sole control, and most of the money withdrawn from the claimants' deposit accounts went to buy real or leasehold property in this company's name. The testator, in 1935 and 1936, caused to be made in this company's books entries showing Winifred a creditor to the extent of some £50,000 on loan account, in which position she remained vis-à-vis the company: and in these proceedings she offered to give credit for those sums against her claims. Similarly, David was credited between 1935 and 1939 with rather over £47,000 against the estates company, and he was willing to bring in that amount. His case, however, was further complicated, notably by dealings in the shares of a company called "Woodside Garden Suburb, Ltd." In March, 1935, about £47,000 was drawn from David's deposit account and credited to Philip, who used the money to buy 880 shares in that company at £45 a share. Those were first held in Philip's name apparently as the testator's nominee; of them, 580 were subsequently transferred by Philip to the testator and 300 were transferred gratuitously to David, representing a cost of £13,500, which he offered in these proceedings to bring into account. In addition, each claimant offered to bring into account £250, the price of shares of that nominal amount in the estates company, the whole of the capital in which, amounting to £1,000, was paid for, in effect, out of moneys standing to the credit of Winifred's deposit account. The remaining shares were registered as to 250 in Philip's name, as to 200 in the testator's name and as to 50 in that of his wife. Also £20,000 drawn out of David's deposit account in March, 1935, was deposited by the testator with the Eastbourne Mutual Building Society in four sums of £5,000, one in his own name and one in the name of each child including Philip. These three latter sums were repaid in 1936 and credited to the children in their accounts with the estates company. £750 out of David's deposit account was used to buy shares in his name in the furnishing business earlier mentioned, which had now been incorporated. That venture was a failure. Finally, £430 was paid to David himself in connexion with a small business in which the testator had set him up.

The resulting claim of Winifred was something over £36,000. That involved treating the original allotments of the shares in the private companies as advancements and showing the testator as discharging himself, except for the sums used for Townsend and Page, by the creation of her deposit account. Thereafter, appropriations out of the deposit account were debited to the testator who, on the other hand, was credited with the loan account created with the estates company and with the 250 estates company shares.

David's claim, based on similar lines, amounted to over £72,000 and the two claims more than sufficed to exhaust the estate, with the result that the claimants would divide it between them to the detriment of the annuitants and of their elder brother, and that the Crown would take nothing by way of estate duty.

Each claimant swore an affidavit in support of the originating summons [characterized by Harman J. as very uncandid documents], starting with a categorical statement which begged the whole question; namely, that before 1934 the testator made various gifts of shares to the deponent. The general tenor of the executors' evidence was followed [Harman J. stated that no one would guess that neither of these children had any knowledge whatever of the transactions up to the end of 1934 until after their father's death.] During the hearing each claimant went into the witness-box and testified to a complete state of ignorance about the whole matter. Each of them did, however, disclose what nowhere appeared in the filed evidence, namely, that the testator from time to time purchased houses in the name of each child and that, at any rate from the time when the child was 21, he or she was informed of these purchases and told that they were gifts. Mrs. Cartwright said that she had never received the rents of the houses in her name during her father's lifetime, and did not ask for them. She said that she thought that they were presents to come to her eventually. In fact, however, she did appear to have had the benefit of the rents, at any rate after the estates company was formed in 1935, they being credited to her loan account. She said that she was quite unaware that Dunk was preparing income tax returns on her behalf, and it appeared that he never consulted her on those matters, but acted on the testator's instructions. The testator apparently secured his daughter's signature to the returns without telling her what they were.

David's position was somewhat different. He was employed by New Ideal Homesteads Ld. on the road-making side, and drew a salary accordingly. He knew of the existence of the companies, but not that his name was registered as a shareholder. He remembered the testator talking of "selling his "business for a great deal of money." In 1935 the testator formed a small company, Richard Shephard Ld., for David, and the £430 paid out of his deposit account to him was connected with the affairs of that company. He said that the testator put in £3,000 or £4,000 on loan account but withdrew his claim when the business was sold, in 1943. A typical instance of their relations was that in 1936 the testator paid David about £5,000 to buy a property at Battle, which he did: but it was conveyed into the name of the estates company which later sold it to Winifred. David observed that the testator had thought of giving him this property, but had changed his mind. David knew that he was a shareholder in the estates company, and supposed that the testator had given him the shares. He also knew about the loan account in 1936 or 1937, and observed that he did not feel the money was really his. He was also a director from 1936 of Woodside Garden Suburb Ld. and knew of the shares in his name and did not inquire how they had been paid for.

There was one further relevant transaction of a different nature from the rest. In 1936, the testator needed cash, and withdrew £10,000 from the funds of Woodside Garden Suburb Ld. That he used for his own purposes, but debited it against David, and when asked by Dunk what the transaction represented, replied that it was "David's capital withdrawn from the company." Dunk, as auditor, interpreted this obscure statement as meaning that £10,000 had been lent to David by the company and entered his name as a debtor to that extent. He said that he supposed that David had had the money. When, therefore, the company went into voluntary liquidation, as it did in 1938, and the assets began to be realized (a process continuing at the time of these proceedings) money fell to be paid to the contributors, they being by this time only the testator and David. As David was shown as a large debtor, no money has been paid to him but £8,065 was paid to the testator. That was known to David, who was himself one of the liquidators, and he year by year passed the distribution accounts after explanations by Dunk why he was not receiving any part of the money distributed.

February 10. HARMAN J., reading his judgment, after stating the facts, considered the last transaction referred to above. He said that David's conduct in passing the distribution accounts was an extraordinary piece of acquiescence, but, when asked about it, he said that he supposed that all the money in the company was his father's and, therefore, saw no reason to question the payments. In these proceedings he claimed that those payments should be readjusted, and it was agreed that, had the distributions been made on the footing that the testator and not David was the debtor for £10,000, the £8,065 so far distributed should not have been allocated in whole to the testator but as to £6,347 to David and £1,718 to the testator. His lordship said that, in his judgment, there was no answer to that claim, and held that that adjustment must be made and further distributions carried out on a like footing. It was said that David's claim in that respect was barred by his acquiescence, but his lordship stated that, in his judgment, he did not know enough of the facts to debar him in law. The adjustment claimed by David must be made and further distributions carried out on the footing that the testator and not David was the debtor for £10,000. His lordship continued:— Apart from this apparently isolated transaction, the claims obviously require the most careful scrutiny. No inkling of the transactions before 1935 apparently reached the claimants during the father's lifetime, though both of them have always been directors of the Estates Company and have known of their loan accounts there. If, however, the original allotments of shares in their names with the private companies are to be treated as advancements to them, so that they became once for all the beneficial owners of those shares, the rest of the claims follow logically on. It is said that the allotments, being unexplained and unaccompanied by contemporary evidence, must be taken to be advancements and that no evidence of the events in and subsequent to 1934 is admissible. This is tantamount to asking the court to decide the matter blindfold, and I for one am unwilling to take this course unless compelled to it by authority.

What, then, is the presumption of advancement? It is merely, as is explained by Eyre C.B. in his judgment in the leading case of Dyer v. Dyer,[1] White & Tudor's Leading Cases, 9th ed., vol. 2, p. 749, a circumstance of evidence which may be used to rebut the contrary principle under which money or stocks or property placed by A without consideration in the name of B are held in the absence of other evidence to belong to A by way of resulting trust.

Eyre C.B. expresses himself as follows: "The clear result "of all the cases, without a single exception, is that the trust of "a legal estate, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold; "whether taken in the names of the purchasers and others jointly,

[1] (1788) 2 Cox 92.

SHEPHARD v. CARTWRIGHT.

Harman J.

"or in the names of others without that of the purchaser; "whether in one name or several; whether jointly or successive— "results to the man who advances the purchase money. This "is a general proposition, supported by all the cases, and there "is nothing to contradict it; and it goes on a strict analogy to "the rule of the common law, that where a feoffment is made "without consideration, the use results to the feoffor. It is the "established doctrine of a court of equity, that this resulting "trust may be rebutted by circumstances in evidence. The cases "go one step further, and prove that the circumstance of one "or more of the nominees being a child or children of the "purchaser, is to operate by rebutting the resulting trust; and "it has been determined in so many cases that the nominee being "a child shall have such operation as a circumstance of evidence, "that we should be disturbing land-marks if we suffered either "of these propositions to be called in question, namely, that such "circumstance shall rebut the resulting trust, and that it shall "do so as a circumstance of evidence. I think it would have "been a more simple doctrine if the children had been considered "as purchasers for a valuable consideration. Natural love and "affection raised a use at common law. Surely, then, it will "rebut a trust resulting to the father. This way of considering "it would have shut out all the circumstances of evidence which "have found their way into many of the cases, and would have "prevented some very nice distinctions, and not very easy to be "understood. Considering it as a circumstance of evidence, "there must be, of course, evidence admitted on the other side. "Thus it was resolved into a question of intent, which was "getting into a very wide sea, without very certain guides."

Where the relationship between the person who provides the property and him (or her) in whose name it is placed is that of father and child, that circumstance will lead the court in the absence of all other evidence to assume that an advancement was intended. But both the doctrine of resulting trust and its converse are only expedients designed to get at the truth where there is no other way of doing so; and presumptions of this sort are rather like the burden of proof in any ordinary cause which ceases to have any great importance where both sides can appear and adduce evidence.

Lord Eldon L.C. in Finch v. Finch,[2] cited in White & Tudor's Leading Cases, 9th ed., vol. 2, p. 766, said: "I remember "the case of Dyer v. Dyer[3]; which was very fully considered; and "the court meant to establish this principle; viz., admitting the "clear rule, that, where A purchases in the name of B, A paying "the consideration, B is a trustee, notwithstanding the Statute "of Frauds, that rule does not obtain, where the purchase is in "the name of a son: that purchase is an advancement prima "facie; and in this sense; that this principle of law and presumption is not to be frittered away by nice refinements."

[2] (1808) 15 Ves. 43, 50.

[3] (1788) 2 Cox 92.

It is, I think, one thing to read a warning against nice refinements, but quite another to detect what is nice in the many different circumstances that arise. For myself, I should not be inclined to consider the evidence so strong in the case of a speculator engaged in making his own and his family's fortune as in that of a man of great property under the old dispensation "advancing" his several children in the way then customary. The difficulty, of course, is that the alleged donor is dead. If he were alive he could go into the witness box and tell the court what his intention was in 1929 or 1934. See Devoy v. Devoy.[4]

I read the observations of Stuart V.-C. who said: "The only "question is whether the evidence of the father is admissible. "The transfer by the father into the names of himself, and his "wife and child, jointly, of a sum of stock, raises a presumption "that he intended it as an advancement. That presumption "may be rebutted by evidence. But in order to rebut it the "evidence must show the real nature of the transaction. Here "the evidence shows that the father intended to confer only a "qualified interest and not to make an absolute gift. From the "state of his circumstances at the time of the transfer he thought "he might be able to afford this sum of stock as separated from "the rest of his property, so as to secure it for the benefit of "himself and wife and child. But he considered it prudent to "preserve a dominion over it for himself, if his circumstances "should make it necessary for him to resort to it. It has been "said that the statement now made, at the end of nine years "after the transfer, is a mere parol declaration of his intention "at that time, and therefore not sufficient to rebut that pre-"sumption, which, according to the doctrine of the court, would "arise from the nature of the transaction as it appeared, without "explanation. In support of that argument it has been said "that if the father had died before he gave evidence of the nature "of the transaction no record would have been preserved of the "transaction, and the court must then have given effect to it "as an advancement to the child. The circumstance that if the "father had died the evidence would have been lost cannot in "the slightest degree affect the truth of the case where the "evidence is not lost. The only question now is whether the "court can disregard the evidence of the father altogether, as "if there had been no record of it at all. Where the conduct "of the father only raises a presumption, and the question is as "to the amount of evidence necessary to rebut the presumption, "it is too much to say that the evidence upon oath of the actor, "although subject to the qualification with which it must be "received as that of an interested witness, is to be wholly "rejected. If it be admissible at all, it rebuts the presumption."

SHEPHARD v. CARTWRIGHT.

Harman J.

Therefore, if it be left there, there would be no need to have recourse to any presumption, and this is well stated in Ex parte Cooper, In re Foster [5] only reported, as far as I can make out, in the Weekly Notes. That is a case about advances by a father to a son. The facts are not stated, but Lindley L.J. says: "When the "parties to such a transaction are alive, and give evidence, there "is no occasion to resort to any presumption; the question is one of "fact."

It is clear enough that records of oral declarations subsequently made by the deceased father tending to negative a gift are not admissible in evidence, and the reasons for this are obvious, first that such statements are mere hearsay, and, secondly, the father cannot be cross-examined upon them. They are, therefore, inadmissible under the ordinary rules of evidence. There are similar objections to written statements of subsequent date, though perhaps they could now be got in under the Evidence Act, 1939, a consideration not present in the reported cases.

It does not seem to me that the same objection applies to subsequent events, as for instance the way in which the shares and their proceeds were dealt with in 1934 and 1935. These, so far as they throw light on what the father's state of mind was when the allotments were made, are, in my judgment, to be treated as part and parcel of the original transaction because intimately connected with it and therefore admissible. It is clear from the leading case of Grey v. Grey [6] that subsequent acts or events are admissible. In that case Lord Nottingham decided that the fact that the son had allowed his father to continue to take the rents and manage the property for the rest of his life ought not to rebut the presumption because of the filial duty owed by a son to his father, but he did not suggest that the subsequent perception of the rents by and the other acts of the father were not circumstances admissible in evidence.

The well-known case of Marshal v. Crutwell [7] is another instance. Sir George Jessel M.R. in his judgment, put its in this way: "As I understand it, the law is this: The mere circum-"stance that the name of a child or a wife is inserted on the "occasion of a purchase of stock is not sufficient to rebut a "resulting trust in favour of the purchaser if the surrounding "circumstances lead to the conclusion that a trust was intended. "Although a purchase in the name of a wife or a child, if "altogether unexplained, will be deemed a gift, yet you may "take surrounding circumstances into consideration, so as to say "that it is a trust, not a gift. So in the case of a stranger, you "may take surrounding circumstances into consideration, so as "to say that a purchase in his name is a gift, not a trust." He then proceeds to review the facts, and I find the words "What "afterwards occurred was this" and a reference to payment of subsequent sums. Sir George Jessel M.R. then treats himself as a juryman "taking into view all the circumstances" and that includes subsequent circumstances, as the report shows.

In In re Gooch[8] Kay J. seems to go further in taking notice of subsequent written statements of the father. I feel some doubt about that case.

Bone v. Pollard[9] is another authority for considering the subsequent mode of dealing with a fund when deciding a question of advancement.

I think that statements, such as those to be found in Sidmouth v. Sidmouth,[10] that only contemporary acts of the father are admissible are too widely stated, if by "acts" it be meant to include circumstances. I observe that in Christy v. Courtenay,[11] Lord Langdale, the judge who decided Sidmouth v. Sidmouth,[12] says that the evidence must consist "mainly if "not exclusively" of contemporary circumstances.

It seems to me, therefore, that I am at liberty to look at the picture as a whole and to come to a conclusion on a consideration of all the circumstances.

The claimants, however, on the assumption that subsequent events might be held to be admissible, did not rely only on the original allotments, but in addition on certain circumstances: (1) Immediately before the shares in New Ideal Homesteads, Ld., were sold to the public company it suited the testator and his partner Mayer to declare a dividend at the rate of £25 10s. a share free of tax. This was the only dividend declared by any of these companies. This, so far as the testator was concerned, was money which he required to repay a debt which he owed to the company, and he did receive half of this dividend on the footing that he was the owner of half of the shares in the company, 300 of which were registered in his children's names. He repaid it at once to the company and so discharged his indebtedness. When, however, in February, 1936, inquiries were made of Dunk by the Revenue Authorities about the right to take this dividend and he applied to the testator for information, he was told that each of the children had "a beneficial interest "in the one dividend paid." The testator's motive in saying this was obvious. Add this dividend to his income, and nearly all of it would be payable by way of surtax, but in his children's hands only a small claim resulted. Nevertheless, this is no doubt a quasi-admission by the testator and one which it may be could not be impugned by a beneficiary under his will on the ground that it was made in order to defraud the Revenue. (See Gascoigne v. Gascoigne.[13]) It seems to me, however, that the principle of this case does not preclude another creditor, as Philip Shephard affects to be, from making this answer. No claim to this dividend appears in the statement of claim, nor is it mentioned in the evidence filed on the originating summons. This I do not understand, for though it relates to income and not to capital very large claims for interest have been included. Indeed, as first postulated compound interest was demanded. Even the claim to simple interest ignores the elementary rule that in calculating debts against an insolvent estate interest is ignored.

(2) The defendant Dunk testified that at the time of the sale to the public company the testator told him that he had received the whole purchase money and put it on a deposit account, with a view to re-investment and that he, the witness, then suggested to the testator that, as, to his knowledge, some of the shares in the private companies had stood in the children's names, deposit accounts should be created in their names also. To this advice the witness attributes the fact that the testator did create deposit accounts in the children's names for the bulk of the proceeds of these sales, so far as they represented shares in their names. I cannot think that there is any great weight in this consideration in view of the fact that the testator at the same time procured from each of the claimants the authorities which enabled him to treat the accounts as his own.

(3) In the recitals to the sale agreement occurs a statement that members of Mayer's family held their shares as nominees for him; no similar recital is included to deal with the Shephard family. I am asked to infer from this acknowledgment by the testator that he had no interest in the claimant's shares. I do not think this inference can be drawn, though the omission is a circumstance of evidence tending against the testator and to be taken into account.

(4) Money from Winifred's deposit account was used as already mentioned to pay the debts of Townsend and Page: this is only an inference drawn by Dunk from the equality of the figures. Anyhow, Winifred never claimed that she was anything but a nominee so far as this business was concerned. A like consideration applies to the money from David's deposit account used to finance or buy shares in the furniture business.

Neither of these children was ever told anything of the 1934 transactions, and they remained throughout the testator's life ignorant of the existence of the original allotments of the sale agreement, and of the deposit accounts. The testator did, on the other hand, acquire a number of house properties in the names of each of these children, and he told them about these as soon as they were of age, or as soon as the properties were bought, and indicated that these were intended to be provisions for them: each child knew he or she had provision made for him or her in this form and also knew about the loan accounts in the estates company. It is obvious that, after the estates company came into existence and loan accounts were created as they were, the testator cannot have intended that his children should be allowed by raking back into his past transactions to prefer further claims against him. Each had been provided with some £50,000, and one can suppose that if in his lifetime a child had suggested that he or she was his father's creditor a very different will would have been left. This does not, of course, prove that the testator had not originally the intention of making a gift; but it seems to me that it makes it unlikely that he intended to commit himself at a time when his fortune was not made and his future was wholly nebulous.

It was not until 1934 that he was in a position to make substantial gifts to anyone, and the transactions of that year speak loudly against any intention to advance; for instance: (i) the whole of the estates company's shares were paid for out of Winifred's deposit account. These were distributed among the family, including some to her step-mother and to her elder brother. I cannot believe that if the testator had thought that the money in this deposit account was hers he could have felt free to use it in this way. (ii) The Woodside Park Estate transaction is another of the same kind. The testator cannot be supposed to have used £37,000 which he supposed to be David's money in buying shares in this company in the name of his brother Philip and, apparently, in fact for himself.

Considering the evidence as a whole, and doing my best to weigh the circumstances on both sides, I feel obliged to come to the conclusion that the testator did not in the earlier allotments of shares any more than in the transactions with the businesses intend to commit himself irrevocably by way of out-and-out gifts. I take the view, as indeed Stuart V.-C. did in Devoy v. Devoy,[14] quoted above, that these were only provisional arrangements not intended to remove his freedom of action, and I find no principle of law which prevents me from giving effect to that view. When the loan accounts in the estates company were created, the position was very different. Here the testator intended provision for the claimants, and he told them so, just as he did in the cases of the houses bought for them. If this be right, the claimants retain what they have, but cannot by appealing to earlier events ask for more.

On the view that I take, the question raised on the executors' plea of the Statute of Limitations does not arise, and I need not embark on it except to say that I do not see how, if I had taken a different view, the statute would, having regard to the claimant's ignorance, have afforded a defence.

On a claim by the respondent, on behalf of Bata National Corporation of Zlin, Czechoslovakia, to register the word "Bata," depicted by cursive writing, as a trade mark in respect of five of their productions, of which the principal was shoes:—

Held, that the word was not registrable as a trade mark in Malta under either section 83 (a) of the Industrial Property (Protection) Ordinance, as "a name of an individual or a firm name "of a commercial partnership, printed or impressed . . . in some "particular and distinctive manner" or section 83 (c) as "a "distinctive device . . . or fancy word . . . not in common use." [Those statutory provisions were identical with those contained in the British Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883.]

While it is doubtful whether a surname alone can be registered under section 83 (a) of the Ordinance (In re Benz et Cie (1913)

To constitute printing in a particular and distinctive manner more is required than a small variation from the name printed in block capitals or in cursive writing or in the form of a signature.

Further, the word "Bata" was neither a fancy word—it was a name well known in Malta—nor a distinctive device—it was a name printed in ordinary lettering with slight immaterial variations.

Although the objection to registration to which the Board had acceded was not taken, or not taken clearly, in the Court of Appeal, it was a plain case where the mark was not registrable, and the Board felt it their duty to have regard to the purity of the register and, in conformity with the views expressed in Paine & Co. v. Daniells & Sons' Breweries Ld. [1893] 2 Ch. 567; 9 T.L.R. 457; 10 R.P.C. 217, 232, to reject the respondent's application.

APPEAL (No. 2 of 1952) from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, Malta (Camilleri and Harding JJ., Borg C.J. dissenting) (December 13, 1950) which affirmed a judgment of Gauci J. in the Commercial Court, Malta (March 31, 1950).

The question for decision before the Commercial Court and in the Court of Appeal was whether the word "Bata" should be registered as a trade mark in Malta in the name of the Bata National Corporation of Zlin, Czechoslovakia, in respect of "tyres" and tubes," "technical rubber," "footwear and stockings," "shoe polish" and "shoe laces" pursuant to five applications made by the respondent to the Comptroller of Industrial Property, Malta.

Those applications for registration were opposed by the appellant, who was the Custodian for Enemy Property of Malta, and who in pursuance thereof began proceedings in the Commercial Court in that capacity, representing the Bata Overseas Shoe Co. Ld. of Valetta, Malta. The respondent, who was the defendant in those proceedings, was a member of the firm of La Rosa Company of Malta, and represented the Bata National Corporation.

Both the Commercial Court and the Court of Appeal decided in favour of registration.

EDGAR STAINES
v.
VICTOR LA ROSA.

1953. January 13, 14, 15, 19 and 27. Quass Q.C. and Guy Aldous for the appellant.

P. Stuart Bevan for the respondent.

February 23. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD PORTER.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, Malta, which dismissed an appeal by the appellant from a judgment of the Commercial Court. In the Court of Appeal the Chief Justice dissented from the decision of his brethren and would have allowed the appeal.

The matter which the court had to determine was whether the word "BATA" should be registered as a trade mark in Malta on behalf of Bata National Corporation of Zlin, Czechoslovakia, in respect of five of their productions, of which the principal is shoes. No distinction, however, need be made between the five since the same considerations apply in each case.

Under section 85 of the Industrial Property (Protection) Ordinance of Malta (Laws of Malta, 1942 Rev., c. 48): "Any "person may have the exclusive use of a trade mark provided "he complies with the provisions of the following sections of this "Part." And section 86, so far as is material to the question at issue, prescribes:—"Any person who is desirous of securing for "himself the exclusive use of any trade mark, must present to "the Comptroller an application in the form annexed hereto, and "accompanied by: (a) two representations of the trade mark."

The prescribed form is in the following terms:—

"You are hereby requested to register the accompanying trade "mark, (.....) in the name of (a)....., who claims to "be the proprietor thereof."

The applicant is told under a note to (a) (above) to insert the name, address and business of the individual or firm on whose behalf his application is made.

Under these provisions Mr. Victor La Rosa, on behalf of Messrs. La Rosa Company, representing the Bata National Corporation of Zlin, Czechoslovakia, applied to register the word "Bata" as a trade mark of various goods produced by the Bata National Corporation. And in November, 1946, the application was duly advertised by the Comptroller as prescribed by section 90 of the Ordinance.

The type of mark which it is permissible to register in Malta is prescribed by section 83 of the Ordinance, which is in the following terms:—

"83.—Marks intended to distinguish the produce of any "industry or articles of trade are considered to be trade marks, "provided they contain at least one of the following particu-"lars:—

"(a) a name of an individual or a firm name of a commercial "partnership, printed, impressed, or woven in some particular "and distinctive manner; or

" (b) a written signature or copy of a written signature of the " individual applying for registration thereof as a trade mark; or

" (c) a distinctive device, mark, brand, heading, label, ticket, " or fancy word or words not in common use."

These provisions are identical with those contained in the British Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act of 1883. The right of registration is, however, qualified in some degree by section 84, which provides:—

" 84.—The marks and words referred to in the last preceding " section must be different from those already legally used by " other persons."

Section 91 of the Ordinance sets out the method by which the registration can be opposed. Anyone may do so by giving notice of opposition at the Office of the Comptroller and giving the grounds of his objection. In reply, the applicant may make a counterstatement, and if both statement and counterstatement are persisted in the objector must then bring an action before the Commercial Court. In the present case these steps were taken by the parties and a writ of summons was duly issued by the appellant on September 29, 1947, and served on the respondent. Ultimately, in the action which followed, both the Commercial and Appellate Courts gave their decision in favour of registration.

The facts with regard to the respective cases appear to be as follows, and are with sufficient accuracy summed up in paragraph 6 of the respondent's case. About 30 years ago a company registered in Czechoslovakia under the name Bata a.s. Zlin began to export to Malta goods of the type now sought to be protected under the mark " BATA," and continued to do so until the outbreak of war in 1939. Until 1932 the goods were supplied to a number of traders, but in that year a company at Tilbury, in England, known as British Bata Shoe Co. Ld., opened first one shop and gradually opened others in Malta where they sold goods manufactured by Bata a.s. Zlin wholesale and retail to the public under the mark " BATA."

By an agreement in writing dated August 3, 1938, Bata Tilbury sold as from January 1, 1939, the whole of the undertaking and assets of their business in Malta to a company known as Bata Shoe Company Overseas Ld. The agreement provided by clause 8: " 8. The vendors hereby agree that subject to the due per- " formance by the purchasers of their obligations under this " agreement the vendors will not at any time hereafter so long " as the said businesses are carried on by the purchasers do any " business on the Isle of Malta or in British West Africa. The " vendors undertake (subject as aforesaid) to cease all activities " there and not during the period aforesaid to sell or supply any " goods in either of the said territories unless authorized by the " purchasers in writing." And from that date the latter company carried on the business previously carried on by Bata Tilbury, using the name " Bata " in the head board of their shops.

J. C.

Edgar Staines v. Victor La Rosa.

From 1924 until the outbreak of war all shoes sold in Malta under the mark BATA, whether sold by the Tilbury or Overseas Company or other retailers, were manufactured by Bata a.s. Zlin and were marked "Bata made in Czechoslovakia" and were imported direct from Bata Zlin. No evidence was adduced establishing that goods manufactured by any other firm had been sold in Malta under the mark Bata between the outbreak of war and the application in respect of the trade marks now in question, though apparently at some time under agreement with the appellant goods were sent after the end of the war by the Tilbury Company to Malta subject to a royalty of 2 per cent. on their c.i.f. value.

After the outbreak of war the Overseas Company was declared an enemy company and the appellant was appointed Custodian of Enemy Property in Malta, and in that capacity opposed the registration of the name. He said: "The word 'Bata' has been "used in Malta over a number of years to distinguish the pro- "ducts of the Bata Shoe Company of Tilbury and after 1938 "those of the plaintiff firm (i.e., Bata Overseas) from other "similar goods sold by other firms. It follows, therefore, that "the registration of the word 'Bata' by another firm would "necessarily create confusion on the local market."

The respondent replied by asserting that the Bata firm at Zlin had been exporting to Malta goods of its own manufacture long before the formation of the Tilbury and Overseas Companies. It is therefore, he said, the plaintiff firm and the firm at Tilbury that, importing goods made by the Bata firm at Zlin, have been competing with that firm.

It appears that up to the date of the appellant's declaration the dispute or, at any rate, the main dispute, centred round the question whether the Bata National Corporation of Zlin was the successor or assignee or in some other way representative of Bata a.s. Zlin, and as to what was the position of the Tilbury and Overseas Companies vis-à-vis that body. The evidence appears to establish that, at any rate so far as shoes are concerned, the goods were obtained direct from Zlin whether the sales were effected through the Tilbury or Overseas Companies, and that no goods other than those manufactured at Zlin were ever put on the market at Malta under the mark "BATA." On the other hand, the evidence also establishes that the Overseas Company exhibited the words "Bata shoes" on its sign boards and sold them both wholesale and retail under that designation, and that the shoes were sold allegedly as British goods though marked "Made in Czechoslovakia."

Their Lordships, however, will assume that the name "Bata" had become descriptive of goods which were manufactured by Bata a.s. Zlin. In this state of facts the appellant made submissions to the Commercial Court that: (1) Since 1932 all Bata goods were sold in Malta first by the Tilbury Company and after 1938 by the Overseas Company and, therefore, if the defendant firm ever had any rights in the mark they had lapsed. (2) That under the terms of a letter of June 22, 1939, Bata a.s. Zlin appointed the Tilbury Company their exclusive representatives for the British Empire except the Far East and Canada, and undertook not to sell in the representatives' territory or transact business in the name of Bata there up till December 31, 1949. (3) That the Bata Corporation should not be recognized as the successor of any or every right formerly enjoyed in Malta by Bata a.s. Zlin considering that Bata a.s. Zlin had been nationalized and the nationalization decrees were of a confiscatory nature; and (4) that the mark was no more than a surname and therefore not registrable.

To those submissions the respondent in substance replied that the Tilbury and Overseas Companies used the mark "Bata" as representative of Bata a.s. Zlin and in no other capacity, and that even if the mark "Bata" denoted no more than a surname yet it was impressed with characteristic features so as to render it easily distinguishable.

The judge agreed with the respondent upon both points. Of the form of the mark he said: "Since it is printed and impressed "in a particular and distinctive manner such as to render it dis- "tinguishable from others, the trade mark is acceptable for "registration."

In his submission to the Court of Appeal the appellant contended firstly that the facts established that the two companies acted on their own account and never as representative of Bata a.s. Zlin, and further that the Bata National Corporation could not be recognized as the successor of the original company inasmuch as it had been nationalized and such nationalization was of a confiscatory nature. In answer the respondent submitted that the rights of the Tilbury and Overseas Companies came to an end under the agreement of June, 1939, on December 31, 1949, and that the evidence established that those companies were in fact the representatives of Bata a.s. Zlin when selling its goods. Those contentions were stated to be "without prejudice to "other submissions."

On those submissions the Court of Appeal, by a majority, found, in agreement with the judge of first instance, that the two companies sold the products of Bata a.s. Zlin as its representatives, and further, that no evidence had been produced to show that Bata a.s. Zlin had been nationalized or, if nationalized, that the nationalization was of a confiscatory character. The Chief Justice differed on the ground that the respondent had not shown that he was the representative of Bata a.s. Zlin or that that firm actually existed at Zlin. He also held the respondent had not complied with the obligations imposed on him by sections 101 and 102 of the Industrial Property (Protection) Ordinance and had not put Bata a.s. Zlin in a position to be registered.

As regards this last matter their Lordships need only say that it is at least doubtful whether the provisions contained in those sections and in the section dealing with patents have any application to a case where the person applying to have a trade mark registered claims as being the original user of the mark or as his successor and not as an assignee, but in the view which their Lordships take of other questions it is not necessary to decide this point.

J. C.

Edgar Staines v. Victor La Rosa.

Their Lordships are conscious that they have set out at length a number of matters which are not strictly germane to the issue on which they propose to rest their judgment. They have done so in part in order that the parties may be assured that they have taken into consideration all the points presented to them and in part because an extreme economy of fact and submission appears in the record which has been presented to the Board, so that they have had, as best they could, to search out what had been proved and what had been contended. In this unsatisfactory nature of the record it is undesirable to reach a conclusion upon any matter in respect of which there may be doubt as to what was and what was not proved. The Board, in coming to a decision, have therefore confined themselves to a matter in which there was ultimately no dispute as to the facts.

On the evidence as finally established they are of opinion that the mark is not registrable under either of the headings put forward by the respondent, viz.:—(1) Under section 83 (a) as a name of an individual or a firm name of a commercial partnership, printed or impressed in some distinctive manner; or (2) under (c) as a distinctive device. Even in this matter the material presented to their Lordships when the hearing began was inaccurate.

The trial judge, as has been pointed out, found: "The word "'Bata,' however, has now acquired goodwill value and is well "known in connexion with shoes manufactured at Zlin; and "since it is printed and impressed in a particular and distinctive "manner, such as to render it distinguishable from others, the "trade mark is acceptable for registration."

Their Lordships found it difficult to appreciate upon what evidence this finding was based, since the only representation of the mark sought to be registered was depicted in block print which plainly lacked distinction. However, at a later stage, an accurate copy of the mark was produced, from which it appears that what may be described as a large cursive hand was adopted as the name or device which was sought to be registered, and if one were looking for slight differences between this and an ordinary printed or cursive hand, it would be possible to find them. But in their Lordships' opinion such an approach is not justified by the Act or by the decided cases.

It was contended before their Lordships, as stated above, that the view of the judge and of the Court of Appeal ought to be supported on one of two grounds, viz.:—(1) As in accordance with the opinion of the Commercial Court "Bata" was the name of an individual "printed . . . in a particular and distinctive " manner "; or (2) as " Bata " was " a distinctive device or a " fancy word not in common use."

(1) Having regard to the observations in such cases (to quote two only) as In re Benz et Cie [1] and Teofani & Co. Ld. v. Teofani,[2] it is doubtful whether a surname alone can be registered under section 83 (a) of the Ordinance. It was argued, however, in the first place, that the word " Bata," though a surname, was the name under which Bata a.s. Zlin was known in Malta and could accordingly be described as its name; in the second place, that Teofani & Co. Ld. v. Teofani [2] was an authority for the proposition that a surname was not necessarily incapable of being registrable; and finally, that decisions generally upon this point were reached upon the terms of the English Trade Marks Act of 1905, which uses the phrase " the name " not " a name," and that under that Act the use of the definite article indicated that the actual name and not that by which the individual or firm was generally known must be used, whereas the use of the indefinite article did not warrant such an inference. In their Lordships' view such a distinction overstresses a slight and immaterial change in the wording of the Acts. But the line of demarcation between what is imprinting in a particular and distinctive manner and what is not requires further consideration, and it may be that if it be shown in an individual case that a person is known in the trade by his surname only, that designation can be regarded as " a name " within the meaning of the Ordinance. For the purpose of this part of the argument, therefore, their Lordships will assume that Bata is a name within the meaning of section 83 (a).

Nevertheless, it has to be shown that it is printed in a particular and distinctive manner. The judge has found that it was so printed, and there is nothing to indicate in the judgment of the Court of Appeal that the point was argued before it or, indeed, was ever brought to its notice. Furthermore, there is no reference in either court to the decided cases, and it may well have been thought in the courts in Malta that any difference between the lettering in use for this mark and ordinary block capitals or an ordinary cursive hand was sufficient. There is, however, a series of decisions in this country to the opposite effect. Such cases as In re British Milk Products Company's Application [3] (where a name written as a signature was held insufficiently distinctive), In re Fanfold Ld.'s Application [4] (in which registration of curved block characters with a scroll at either end was rejected), and Registrar of Trade Marks v. W. & G. Du Cros Ld.[5] (where a particular type of signature was not accepted)—to quote but three of the relevant cases—show that to constitute printing in a particular and distinctive manner more is required than a small variation from the name printed in block capitals or in a cursive writing or in the form of a signature.

It is true that the decisions in In re H. G. Burford & Co. Ld.'s Application [6] and in Teofani & Co. Ld. v. Teofani [7] might be urged as giving some support to the respondent's argument, but both cases were decided not under the wording contained in the Ordinance or the English Act of 1883, but under section 9 (5) of the Act of 1905, which provided that: "A registrable trade mark "must contain or consist of at least one of the following essential "particulars . . . (5) any other distinctive mark, but a name, "signature, or word or words, other than such as fall within the "descriptions in the above paragraph (1), (2), (3) and (4), shall "not, except by order of the Board of Trade or the court, be "deemed a distinctive mark," and in each case a special application was made and granted under that section.

Those cases have therefore no direct bearing on a case where the special provisions of that subsection do not prevail, and in their Lordships' opinion, having regard to the cases decided upon the provisions of Trade Marks Acts apart from that subsection, the method of imprinting the name "Bata" adopted in this case cannot be regarded as particular or distinctive.

(2) If, however, he fails on this contention, the respondent maintains that the mark may be regarded as a distinctive device or mark or a fancy word not in common use.

A fancy word it is not—it was a name well known in Malta, whether it be regarded as used by the respondent or by the Tilbury or Overseas Companies. Nor does the fanciful use of a word make it a fancy word, e.g., "Melrose" of a hair restorer or "Electric" of velveteen (see In re Van Duzer's Trade Mark [8]).

Nor is it a distinctive device; it is a name printed in ordinary lettering with slight immaterial variations. To permit it to be registrable as a device would result in allowing the registration of names, which are not distinctive as names, under the assertion that they were distinctive as devices, and would throw open a wide extension of a field which has been carefully limited.

Their Lordships have, however, felt some difficulty in rejecting the respondent's contention, not because they feel any doubt as to the true interpretation of the Ordinance, but because the objection to which they have acceded, though taken in the Commercial Court, was not taken or, at any rate, not taken clearly, in the Court of Appeal. Indeed, it is not even mentioned in any of the judgments. But in a plain case where in the Board's opinion the mark is clearly unregistrable, they feel it their duty to have regard to the purity of the register and in conformity with the views expressed in Paine & Co. v. Daniells & Sons' Breweries Ld. [9] to reject the respondent's application and will humbly advise Her Majesty to allow the appeal.

As, however, the argument which has succeeded appears to have either not been taken or, at least, not urged in the Court of Appeal, each party must pay its own costs of the proceedings in the courts of Malta and before their Lordships' Board.

The applicants were incorporated under the Companies Act, 1948, with a capital of £100 in £1 shares, 90 of which were held by one director, J., an American citizen, 10 by the second, who was British, and none by the third, who also was British. The applicants' sole place of business was their registered office, and they did not employ any staff. They agreed to produce a film based on a story the film rights in which were in an American company of which J. was president, and which agreed to provide the finance and whatever facilities the applicants might require. The film was made in India, and the applicants applied to the Board of Trade to register it as a British film, which the Board of Trade, while admitting that the applicants were a British company as defined in the Act, declined to do on the ground that the applicants were not the "maker" of the film within the meaning of sections 25 (1) (a) and 44 (1) of the Cinematograph Films Act, 1938. On a summons by the applicants pursuant to section 31 of the Act:—

Held, (1) that to satisfy the requirement of section 25 (1) (a) the applicants must establish that they were the sole makers of the film; (2) that it was contrary to all sense and reason and to the proved and admitted facts to say that the applicants undertook the arrangements for the making of the film, as their participation in any such undertaking was so small as to be practically negligible, and as they had acted, in so far as they acted at all, merely as the nominees of the American company. The applicants' intervention was purely colourable, and they were brought into existence for the sole purpose of being put forward as having undertaken the arrangements necessary for the making of the film and of enabling it to qualify as a British film, and the Board of Trade's decision not to register the film as a British film was right.

Adjourned summons.

On May 29, 1951, the applicants were incorporated under the Companies Act, 1948, with a capital of £100 divided into 100 shares of £1 each. There were three directors: one, an American citizen, who held 90 of the shares, and the other two British subjects, one of whom held the remaining 10, the other having no shareholding. The applicants had no place of business apart from their registered office, and did not employ any staff. They agreed to produce a film entitled "Monsoon," based on a story the film rights in which had been acquired by an American company called Film Group Incorporated, of which the American citizen who was the principal shareholder in the applicant company was president. Film Group Incorporated agreed to and did provide the necessary finance for the film and all the facilities required by the applicants for the production which took place in India. Pursuant to section 23 of the Cinematograph Films Act, 1938, as amended by the schedule to the Cinematograph Films Act, 1948, the applicants applied to the Board of Trade for the registration of the film as a British film. The Board of Trade admitted that the applicants were a "British company" as defined by the Act, being, within section 25 (2) thereof, "a company incorporated under the laws "of any part of His Majesty's dominions, being a company the "directors of which, or a majority of the directors of which, were "British subjects"; that the studio used in making the film was within Her Majesty's dominions, namely, in India; and that the statutory requirement concerning the labour costs had been fulfilled: but the Board refused to register the film as a British film on the ground that it was not made by the applicants.

By this summons the applicants sought a declaration (1) that they were the "maker" of the film "Monsoon" within the meaning of the Act and of the amending Act of 1948; (2) that throughout the time when the film was being made they were a British company within the meaning of the Act; and (3) that the maker of the film was, throughout the time that it was being made, a British company, namely, the applicants.

The sole question, therefore, which I have to decide is whether the applicants were the "maker" of the film. This is what they claim to be, but the respondent has decided that they were not and has, on that ground, refused to register the film "Monsoon" as a British film. The applicants, being aggrieved by that decision, are, in accordance with section 31 of the Act making the present application to the court. In substance, I am asked to reverse the respondent's decision and to say that "Monsoon" is a British film under the Act.

In section 44 of the Act the expression "maker" is defined as meaning, "in relation to a film, the person by whom the "arrangements necessary for the making of the film are under-"taken. . . ." This is perhaps a strange collocation of words which might in other circumstances give rise to some difficulty of interpretation. "Undertake" means, I think, "be responsible "for," especially in the financial sense, but also generally. So far as the present case is concerned, I think that it plainly suggests the following problem: was it the applicants alone who undertook the arrangements necessary for the making of the film, or did they do so in co-operation with some other person, firm or company, reading as including the plural number (in accordance with the Interpretation Act, 1889) the words "maker," "British "subject" and "British company" in section 25 and the words

"theatre in Great Britain any film to "which this Act applies, being a film "which he knows, or ought to have "known, not to be a registered film. ". . ."

S. 23: "(1) Upon application duly "made to them . . . for the registra-"tion of a film to which this Act "applies, the Board of Trade shall, "subject to the following provisions "of this Part of this Act, register the "film under this Part of this Act in "a register to be kept by the Board "for the purpose."

"(2) The register shall be so kept "as to record, in relation to each film "registered therein—(a) . . . the fact "that it is a British film or a foreign "film, as the case may be. . . ."

S. 25 (1): ". . . a film shall . . . "be deemed to be a British film if, "and only if,—(a) the maker of the "film was, throughout the time "during which the film was being "made, either a British subject or a "British company, and (b) the "studio, if any, used in making the "film was within His Majesty's "dominions, and (c) not less than "the requisite amount of labour costs "represents payments paid or pay-"able in respect of the labour or ser-"vices of British subjects or persons "domiciled in some part of His "Majesty's dominions."

S. 31 (1): "Any person who is "aggrieved by any decision taken by "the Board of Trade for the purpose "of the performance of their duties in "relation to the register, may, subject "to rules of court, make application "in the matter to the High Court, "and the decision of that court on "any such application shall be final "and not subject to appeal to any "other court."

S. 35: "The films to which "this Act [and the Act of 1948] "apply are all cinematograph films "other than—(a) films consisting "wholly or mainly of photographs "which, at the time when they were "taken, were means of communicat-"ing news, or (b) films made wholly "or mainly for the purpose of com-"mercial advertisement, or (c) films "certified under subsection (2) of "section 7 of the Finance Act, 1935, "as being entitled to exemption from "customs duties under the convention "for facilitating the international "circulation of films of an educational "character which is referred to in "that subsection."

" maker " and " person " in the definition ? Here the applicants can succeed only if they establish themselves as the sole statutory makers of the film, for, if they were (as may well be the case) one of several makers, the other " maker " or " makers " certainly cannot, in the circumstances of this case, be brought within the description of " British subject " or " British company." Their claim is to be, or to have been, the sole exclusive maker of the film.

The applicants have a capital of £100, divided into 100 shares of £1 each, 90 of which are held by the American director and the remaining 10 by a British one. The third director has no shareholding. I now understand that they have no place of business apart from their registered office, and they did not employ any staff. It seems to me to be contrary, not only to all sense and reason, but to the proved and admitted facts of the case, to say or to believe that this insignificant company undertook in any real sense of that word the arrangements for the making of this film. I think that their participation in any such undertaking was so small as to be practically negligible, and that they acted, in so far as they acted at all in the matter, merely as the nominee of and agent for an American company called Film Group Incorporated, which seems (among other things) to have financed the making of the film to the extent of at least £80,000 under the auspices and direction of the said American director, who happened to be its president. The suggestion that this American company and that director were merely agents for the applicants is, to my mind, inconsistent with and contradicted by the evidence, and a mere travesty of the facts, as I understand and hold them to be.

The applicants' intervention in the matter was purely colourable. They were brought into existence for the sole purpose of being put forward as having undertaken the very elaborate arrangements necessary for the making of this film and of enabling it thereby to qualify as a British film. The attempt has failed, and the respondent's decision not to register " Monsoon " as a British film was, in my judgment, plainly right.

In lieu of the declarations for which the applicants ask, I will declare that the applicants were not the makers of the film called " Monsoon " and that that film is not a British film within the meaning of the Cinematograph Films Acts, 1938 and 1948.

A bookmaker, who for many years had regularly attended a race-track under the management and control of the defendants, and who had on each occasion paid an entrance fee in excess of the charge authorized by section 13 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, brought proceedings against the defendants as occupiers of the race-track for the recovery of the excess. The defendants claimed, inter alia, that if any payments in excess of the charge authorized by the Act had been made, such payments had contravened section 13 of the Act and were irrecoverable, or alternatively, that such excess payments had been made under a mistake of law and were illegal and irrecoverable:—

Held, first, that section 13 of the Act was a penal section and the contract made between the defendants and the plaintiff on each occasion of his admission to the stadium for an excess fee was an illegal contract, but that the parties were not in pari delicto, on the principle laid down in Browning v. Morris (1778) 2 Cowp. 790, at p. 792, and an action to recover the money could be brought.

Held, secondly, that, although the plaintiff by his claim for money had and received might be said indirectly to be enforcing the obligations laid down by section 13 of the Act, it was not a claim under the Act, and he was not debarred, even though the section did not create obligations enforceable in civil proceedings, from putting forward his claim.

ACTION.

The plaintiff was a bookmaker and the defendants were the occupiers of a dog race-track known as the Portsmouth Stadium Greyhound Racing Track, which was under their management and control. The race-track was licensed under the provisions of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934.[1]

The plaintiff claimed that he regularly attended the race-track during the years 1941–49 to carry on his business as a bookmaker, and on each occasion he paid an entrance fee of £2. The entrance fee for members of the public was 2s. 3d., and the plaintiff said that he should have been charged no more than five times that fee, namely, 11s. 3d. He accordingly alleged that the £2 charged was in excess of the authorized fee laid down by section 13 of the Act, and claimed from the defendants the sum of £897, being the excess fees paid by him over the period, as money paid under a mistake of fact or as money had and received by the defendants to his use.

The defendants disputed the claim and pleaded the Limitation Act, 1939, in respect of part of the payments alleged to have been made, and also pleaded that if the plaintiff had made the payments as alleged they had been made in breach of the provisions of the Act of 1934 and were not recoverable, and that the statement of claim showed no cause of action. Alternatively, it was pleaded that, if the payments had been made, they had been made under a mistake of law and were illegal and irrecoverable.

By an order of the master, under Ord. 25, r. 2, the point of law that the payments had been made under a mistake of law was set down for hearing before the trial of the action, and at the hearing it was agreed by the parties that the point of law that the payments had been made in breach of the provisions of the Act of 1934 should also be heard and determined as a preliminary point.

Parker J. This is a claim for money had and received. The plaintiff is a bookmaker who for many years has attended the Portsmouth Stadium Greyhound Racing Track, which is in the occupation and under the management and control of the defendants. The plaintiff claims that as a condition of obtaining admittance to the track he had to pay an admission charge which exceeded the amount permitted by section 13 of the Betting and Lotteries Act, 1934, and it is the excess so paid over a period which he claims as money had and received by the defendants to his use. [His Lordship stated the material terms of section 13 and continued:] A great number of defences were raised, and by paragraph 8 of the defence it is contended, inter alia, that any payment made by the plaintiff was made under a mistake of law and was illegal, and, therefore, irrecoverable. By an order of the master dated October 20, 1952, it was ordered that the issue so raised should be tried as a preliminary point under Ord. 25, r. 2. It is further alleged by paragraph 6 of the defence that any payments made are not recoverable by reason of any matter set out in the statement of claim or by reason of the Act or at all, and that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action. It was agreed between the parties that it would be convenient if this issue also were determined as a preliminary point, and accordingly I consented to the master's order being amended to include this issue.

Section 13 of the Act of 1934 is a penal section, and accordingly, as the defendants contend, the contract made with the plaintiff on his admission on each occasion to the stadium was an illegal contract and, prima facie, any excess payment is irrecoverable. The plaintiff, in answer, contends that he was not in pari delicto, and in this connexion refers to Browning v. Morris,[1] where Lord Mansfield stated the principle as follows: "But, "where contracts or transactions are prohibited by positive "statutes, for the sake of protecting one set of men from another "set of men; the one, from their situation and condition, being "liable to be oppressed or imposed upon by the other; there, "the parties are not in pari delicto; and in furtherance of these "statutes, the person injured, after the transaction is finished "and completed, may bring his action and defeat the contract." I think that that principle applies in this case, and, indeed, Mr. McLellan, for the defendants, does not contend to the contrary. What, however, he maintains is that, even so, these proceedings do not lie because section 13 of the Act of 1934 lays down obligations which are enforceable only by criminal proceedings and not by civil proceedings; and he refers me to the comparatively recent case of Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium Ld.[2] In that case, which was concerned with this very Act of 1934, Lord Simonds said: "Part II may perhaps be ignored, but Part I "and Part III must clearly be read as a whole. So reading it, "I have no doubt that the primary intention of the Act was to "regulate in certain respects the conduct of race tracks and in "particular the conduct of betting operations thereon. If in "consequence of those regulations being observed some book-"makers will be benefited, that does not mean that the Act was "passed for the benefit of bookmakers in the sense in which it "was said of a Factory Act that it was passed in favour of the "workmen in factories. I agree with Somervell L.J.[3] that "where an Act regulates the way in which a place of amuse-"ment is to be managed, the interests of the public who resort "to it may be expected to be the primary consideration of the "legislature. If from the work of regulation any class of persons "derives an advantage, that does not spring from the primary "purpose and intention of the Act."

In that case, however, it is to be observed that the proceedings were in effect an action to enforce a statutory duty. Section 11 of the Act obliges a person in the position of the defendants to provide a bookmaker with space on the track where he can conveniently carry on bookmaking, and the plaintiff in that case claimed injunctions and declarations, in effect, to make the defendants carry out that obligation. In the present case the plaintiff is not, as was the plaintiff in that case, seeking to enforce directly an obligation created by the section of the Act: his claim here is for money had and received, and although it can perhaps be said that he is indirectly enforcing the obligation laid down by section 13, I do not think that thereby he is debarred from putting forward his claim. It is not a claim under the Act.

For these reasons I think that these issues must be determined in the plaintiff's favour.

*PRACTICE NOTE (NOTICE TO PRODUCE).

1953
Feb. 24.

Karminski J.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Practice—Undefended suit—Notice to produce.

During the hearing of an undefended petition alleging desertion it came to light that notice to produce had not been given to the respondent in respect of certain relevant correspondence.

Karminski J. This business of giving notice to produce is not in my view an academic exercise. I am perfectly well aware that in nine cases out of ten it may not have any result whatsoever, but in the tenth case people do produce letters, and sometimes the complete correspondence is before the court, as in a defended case. Why should I not at any rate see whether the respondent was willing to produce any letters? I do not know what the petitioner was writing to her; I am not allowed to know.

[His Lordship, accepting counsel's statement that the correspondence had not been deliberately withheld, said:] I am sure that it was not. But those instructing you, let us be frank about it, have not done their duty. That is what it amounts to.

[His Lordship then heard further evidence and said:] Accepting the evidence of the last witness, as I do, I think that I can take a complete view of the case on the rather incomplete evidence before me. I want it to be clearly understood that but for the very helpful evidence of that witness I would have been compelled to adjourn this case and incur additional expense. However, I propose to grant a decree nisi.

PRACTICE NOTE (NOTICE TO PRODUCE).

During the hearing of a later case on his Lordship's list that day it again transpired that notice to produce had not been given.

KARMINSKI J. I am worried again by the absence of the documents, and I hope that what I have said will be widely circulated. I am most reluctant to adjourn these cases but sometimes there is no alternative. However, in this case, having regard to the whole history and to the nature of the respondent's letters, which give me some idea of what the petitioner had been writing, I can properly act.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.]

* PRACTICE NOTE (INDORSEMENT ON INDICTMENT).

1953
Feb. 23

Lord Goddard C.J., Byrne and Gerrard JJ.

Criminal Law—Practice—Quarter sessions—Indictment—Transfer to another court—Indorsement—Assizes and Quarter Sessions (Convenient Court) Order, 1926 (S.R. & O. 1926, No. 774).

ON an application for leave to appeal against conviction, the court stated that there was no ground for granting the application, but that it was desirable to state what had happened in the case and to give a ruling or direction to quarter sessions with regard to the practice where an indictment found at one quarter sessions was for any reason ordered to be tried at another quarter sessions.

The prisoner was originally indicted at the midsummer quarter sessions for the County Borough of Dudley and charged with obtaining money by false pretences. He was tried before the recorder and the jury disagreed. The recorder then made an order for the case to be retried at the West Bromwich Borough Quarter Sessions. The recorder at West Bromwich, according to a note which had been indorsed on the indictment, felt a difficulty about trying the case because he had been concerned professionally with the man on other occasions when he had been charged with crime, so that the recorder felt that it would not be very satisfactory for him to deal with the case. He accordingly ordered that the indictment should be tried at the Worcestershire County Quarter Sessions. No formal indorsement was made on the indictment, and, when it reached the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, the chairman at Worcester refused to try the case because an indorsement had not been put on the indictment saying that it was to be tried at the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions. He accordingly sent it back to West Bromwich, and then the recorder of West Bromwich sent it to be tried at Wolverhampton, where it was eventually tried.

[Reported by Miss C. J. ELLIS, Barrister-at-Law.]

PRACTICE NOTE (INDORSEMENT ON INDICTMENT).

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts set out above and continued: It is rather unfortunate that an indictment should be sent backwards and forwards in this manner merely because an indorsement has not been put on it. Section 14 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, which is the Act under which, if it is inconvenient or impossible for any reason that a case should be tried at one assizes or one quarter sessions, it may be sent for trial to another assizes or quarter sessions, does not say that the court which is sending the case for trial must indorse on it an order that the case is to be sent there. The proper course is for the clerk of the peace to forward all the documents in the case together with the indictment, and then the court can be informed that the case has been sent forward for trial from the foreign court. The only provisions with regard to the section are contained in the Assizes and Quarter Sessions (Convenient Court) Order, 1926, paragraph 1: "(c) all recognizances, inquisitions, "depositions (including exhibits thereto) and documents shall be "transmitted to the proper officer of the court at which the "person is to be tried or retried; (d) any commissions, writs, "precepts, indictments, recognizances, proceedings and docu- "ments may be altered so far as may be necessary for the "purpose of giving effect to the said section 14 and to this "Order."

The provision of that Order only says that indictments may be altered so far as necessary for the purpose of giving effect to section 14. Section 14 enables the foreign court to try the case, and there would be no reason why, when the matter was before the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, and the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions were informed that the indictment had been received from West Bromwich, the court of trial in the indictment should not have been altered to the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the County of Worcester. They could have altered it themselves, and I think that quarter sessions should understand that neither the statute nor the order compels the remitting court to alter the documents, although, no doubt, it would often be very desirable that they should put some indorsement on the indictment saying: "Ordered to be tried at "such and such a court." When the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions received this indictment they could have been informed by counsel or the clerk of the peace that it had been received from another quarter sessions; that the recorder there had transferred the case, for whatever reason, for them to try; and they could have altered the place of trial in the indictment, which is really the only thing that need be altered, and the case might have proceeded. If that had been done, this case would have been disposed of very much sooner than it has been, but, in the circumstances of the case, there is no ground for giving leave to appeal against conviction.

* ROTTERDAMSCHE BANK N.V. AND ANOTHER v. BRITISH OVERSEAS AIRWAYS CORPORATION AND ANOTHER.

Pilcher J.

Carriage by Air—International carriage—Loss of goods—Damages—Jurisdiction—Carriers named in consignment note—Carriage on their behalf—Doctrine of deviation—Carriage by Air Act, 1932 (22 & 23 Geo. 5, c. 36), s. 1; Sch. 1—Warsaw Convention, arts. 28 (1), 30 (1).

The first plaintiff bank delivered to a Dutch airline a case containing 2,000 gold sovereigns for carriage by air from Amsterdam to Djibouti and delivery there to the second plaintiff bank. The air consignment note, which was the document evidencing the contract of carriage, provided for the goods to be carried by the Dutch airline from Amsterdam to Cairo, and thence by another service to Asmara, and thence to Djibouti. It appeared from the air consignment note, and B.O.A.C.'s timetables which were incorporated therein, that while B.O.A.C. were to be paid as carriers from Cairo to Djibouti, that portion of the carriage was being undertaken by Aden Airways Ld., a wholly owned subsidiary of B.O.A.C. On arrival of the goods at Cairo they were loaded on a 'plane belonging to Aden Airways. The goods, instead of being transhipped at Asmara, were left on board the aircraft and carried on to Aden where, whilst still in the custody of the second defendants, they were stolen by some person or persons unknown and had never been recovered. A writ having been issued against B.O.A.C. and Aden Airways in respect of the loss, Aden Airways took out a summons to set aside the writ as against them on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the claim against them:—

Held, that the carriage as described in the consignment note was, on the face of it, an international carriage to be performed by successive carriers, and it did not cease to be an international carriage merely because at Cairo the goods were transferred to an Aden Airways 'plane. Further, the over carriage or miscarriage of the goods did not deprive the carriage of its international character. The whole contractual carriage from Amsterdam to Djibouti was accordingly an international carriage by air and was subject to the provisions of the Carriage by Air Act, 1932, which, by section 1, made applicable the terms of the Warsaw Convention, which was itself scheduled to the Act. Article 30 (1) of the Convention provided the necessary contractual link between the plaintiffs and the second defendants in respect of that part of the carriage in fact performed by them, but since the second defendants were ordinarily resident in Aden, where they had their principal place of business, they could only be sued, pursuant to article 28 (1) of the Convention, either at Aden or at Djibouti, which was the contractual place of destination of the goods, and therefore the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the claim against that company, and the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action against them must be set aside.

SUMMONS to set aside writ.

The two plaintiffs were, respectively, Rotterdamsche Bank N.V., who were a Dutch Bank incorporated under the laws of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, and whose registered office was in Rotterdam; and the Banque de L'Indochine of Djibouti in French Somaliland, which was a corporate body incorporated according to the laws of France, with its registered office in Paris. The first defendants, British Overseas Airways, were a British company registered in this country, and the second defendants, Aden Airways Ld., were a limited company registered under the Indian Companies Acts, which were apparently applicable in the colony of Aden. The second defendants carried on business as an air transport undertaking and were in fact a wholly owned subsidiary of the first defendants.

On March 22, 1950, the first plaintiffs delivered to K.L.M., a well-known Dutch airline, a case containing 2,000 gold sovereigns for carriage by air from Amsterdam to Djibouti, and delivery there to the second plaintiffs, the Banque de L'Indochine, upon the terms of an air consignment note numbered 279638. The first plaintiffs were the named consignors, and the second plaintiffs the named consignees of the goods in question.

The air consignment note, which was the document evidencing the contract of carriage of the goods, provided that the goods were to be carried to Djibouti in the following manner: by K.L.M. on Service K.L. 829 from Amsterdam to Cairo on March 25, 1950, and thence on Service B.O. 471 from Cairo to Asmara on March 28, 1950, and again on Service B.O. 477 from Asmara to Djibouti on March 29, 1950. The goods were duly loaded on board a K.L.M. 'plane and carried from Amsterdam to Cairo. In the result they were never delivered at Djibouti.

At Cairo the goods were loaded on an aircraft owned by the second defendants. That aircraft was operating, apparently on behalf of the British Overseas Airways Corporation, a service numbered on the British Overseas Airways Corporation's timetable of Speedbird World Air Routes as B.O. 471, which was the number of the service between Cairo and Asmara provided for in the air consignment note under which the goods were carried. The goods should have been transhipped at Asmara, but owing to some negligence or oversight they were left on board the aircraft and carried on in that same aircraft to Aden, that was to say, across the Red Sea from Africa to Arabia. The flying time allowed between Asmara and Aden on British Overseas Airways Corporation's published timetable was two hours and 50 minutes. The air consignment note provided that the goods should have been transhipped at Asmara and forwarded thence to Djibouti by Service No. 477, which was also operated by the second defendants. On arrival at Aden and whilst still in the custody of Aden Airways the goods were stolen by some person or persons unknown and were never recovered.

A writ was issued against the defendants and leave to serve Aden Airways Ld. out of the jurisdiction was granted. Aden Airways Ld. entered a conditional appearance and then took out a summons to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings against them on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiffs' claim against them. The defendants' summons was adjourned and a further summons taken out to transfer the case to the commercial list, which summons was treated as a summons issued in the Commercial Court to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings.

The terms of the air consignment note appear more fully from the judgment.

February 18. PILCHER J., after stating the facts:—The air consignment note, which constituted the contract of carriage, was between the K.L.M. Company and the first plaintiffs. The carriage as described in the consignment note was, on the face of it, an "international carriage" and thus subject to the provisions of the Carriage by Air Act, 1932, which gives effect to the Warsaw Convention for the unification of certain rules relating to the international carriage by air. The Convention itself is scheduled to the Act. Section 1 of the Act of 1932 provides that the provisions of the Convention shall, so far as they relate to the rights and liabilities of carriers, consignors and consignees, have the force of law in the United Kingdom in relation to any carriage by air to which the Convention applies, irrespective of the nationality of the aircraft performing the carriage. Section 3 provides that Her Majesty may by Order in Council apply the provisions of the Act to any colony. I understand that appropriate action has been taken under this section to apply the provisions of the Act to the Colony of Aden. France and Holland are both signatories to the Convention.

One of the principal issues between the parties was whether the goods were in fact at the material time on an "international" carriage" and thus subject to the Convention. To render this judgment intelligible it is necessary that I should first set out the material articles of the Convention.

"Article 1—(1) This Convention applies to all international "carriage of persons, luggage or goods performed by aircraft for "reward. It applies equally to gratuitous carriage by aircraft "performed by an air transport undertaking. (2) For the "purposes of this Convention the expression 'international "carriage' means any carriage in which, according to the con-"tract made by the parties, the place of departure and the place

" Article 30—(1) In the case of carriage to be performed by " various successive carriers and falling within the definition set " out in the third paragraph of article 1, each carrier who " accepts passengers, luggage or goods is subjected to the rules " set out in this Convention, and is deemed to be one of the " contracting parties to the contract of carriage in so far as the " contract deals with that part of the carriage which is performed " under his supervision. . . . " which the parties purport to infringe the rules laid down by this " Convention, whether by deciding the law to be applied, or by " altering the rules as to jurisdiction, shall be null and void."

" Article 33. Nothing contained in this Convention shall " prevent the carrier either from refusing to enter into any con- " tract of carriage, or from making regulations which do not " conflict with the provisions of this Convention."

Whilst the contract of carriage made in the air consignment note was on the face of it between the first plaintiffs and the K.L.M. Company, article 30 (1) makes it clear that where international air carriage is undertaken by successive carriers, as in this case, each carrier who accepts goods is deemed to be one of the contracting parties to the contract of carriage in so far as the contract deals with that part of the carriage which is performed under his supervision.

Accordingly, it would seem on one reading of the air consignment note that British Overseas Airways Corporation were contractually bound under the terms of the Convention to perform their part of the contract of carriage evidenced by the air consignment note, namely, from Cairo to Djibouti. No mention, however, was made in this document of the second defendants, and these defendants were a separate legal entity. The plaintiffs contended that the second defendants were not contractually bound in any fashion, and that the portion of the air carriage conducted by them was not subject to the terms of the Convention. They pointed out that the consignment note made it clear that British Overseas Airways Corporation undertook the carriage from Cairo to Djibouti and that the whole freight from Cairo to Djibouti was payable to British Overseas Airways Corporation. They further said that article 30 (3) gave the consignee a right of action against the last carrier, and they pointed out that the last carrier named in the consignment note was the British Overseas Airways Corporation and not the second defendants.

The writ in the action was indorsed in the widest terms and claimed against the first and/or second defendants, as bailees or carriers, for damages for negligence, breach of duty, breach of contract, wilful misconduct, conversion, etc. The writ was issued on March 20, 1952, and served on the first defendants on the following day, just within the limitation period of two years provided by article 29 of the Convention. I was informed by counsel that the plaintiffs were out of time in regard to taking proceedings against the second defendants in the Aden courts.

Mr. Rodger Winn, who appeared on behalf of both defendants, admitted on behalf of the British Overseas Airways Corporation that they were liable for the limited sum of 250 francs per kilogram on the weight of the goods as provided by article 22 (2) of the Convention. I understand that on this basis the liability of British Overseas Airways Corporation would be somewhat over £100 on goods admittedly worth about £8,000. One of the issues to be determined between the plaintiffs and British Overseas

Airways Corporation on the trial of the action will be whether the loss was due to their " wilful misconduct " under article 25, in which case they would not be entitled to take advantage of the provisions of article 22 (2) referred to above.

As regards the second defendants, Mr. Rodger Winn conceded that they were " necessary " parties to the action under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (g), and further conceded that if the courts of this country had jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiffs' claim against them they were also " proper " parties within that sub-rule. He contended, however, that the terms of the Convention, which have the force of law in this country, precluded this or any English court from entertaining a claim against the second defendants in this particular case. His argument ran along these lines. On the face of the air consignment note (which was the contractual document) there was no contract of carriage between the plaintiffs and the second defendants, so that the plaintiffs could not sue the second defendants in contract at common law. Article 30 (1) of the Convention, which enacted that every carrier who accepted goods for international carriage was deemed to be one of the contracting parties to the contract of carriage in so far as the contract dealt with that part of the carriage which was to be performed by him, provided the necessary contractual link between the plaintiffs and the second defendants in respect of that part of the carriage which was in fact performed by the second defendants. He also pointed to the fact that the Services B.O. 471, from Cairo to Asmara, and B.O. 477, from Asmara to Djibouti, which were the services specifically provided for in the air consignment note, were services advertised by British Overseas Airways Corporation in their timetable as being operated by Aden Airways Ltd., which was a wholly owned subsidiary of British Overseas Airways Corporation, and that whilst British Overseas Airways Corporation were described in the portion of the air consignment note devoted to " charges " as being the contemplated carriers from Cairo to Djibouti, that portion of the note was reserved for entries to be made by the carrier alone, whereas a glance at the description of the services which were to be used would inform anyone who looked at the British Overseas Airways Corporation's timetable that the contemplated carriage from Cairo to Asmara and from Asmara to Djibouti was to be performed, not by a British Overseas Airways Corporation aircraft but by an aircraft operated by Aden Airways Ltd. I should here add that opposite the description of the services to be used there was the note: " Method of routing—Agreed stopping places; see " also timetables of the carriers and conditions on the reverse " hereof." Mr. Winn accordingly submitted that these goods were in fact lost whilst being carried upon a flight to which all the provisions of the Convention applied.

He then turned to article 28 (1), and pointed out that under that article, if Aden Airways Ltd. were to be sued at all, it must be either at Aden where they are admittedly ordinarily resident and had their principal place of business, or at Djibouti, which was the contractual place of destination of the goods. He submitted that the effect of that article, which in this country now has the force of law, was to limit the courts in which action could be brought to those set out in the article and thus, in the circumstances of this case, to oust the jurisdiction of the courts of this country to entertain a claim against the second defendants. There is no doubt that R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1, is only procedural in the sense that it deals with the circumstances in which leave may be given to serve a writ or notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction. It is perhaps unnecessary to say that the Order does not purport to enlarge or restrict the inherent jurisdiction of the courts of this country.

Mr. Kerr, on behalf of the plaintiffs, argued that inasmuch as Aden Airways Ld. were nowhere mentioned in the contractual document, namely, the air consignment note, they were not parties to the contract of carriage nor were they deemed to be so under article 30 (1), because that article only provided that a subsequent carrier should be deemed to be a party " in so far as " the contract deals with that part of the carriage which is " performed under his supervision." He pointed out that the portion of the air consignment note which dealt with " charges " provided for carriage from Cairo to Djibouti by British Overseas Airways Corporation, and that British Overseas Airways Corporation were to receive the freight for that portion of the carriage.

In my view the matter must be looked at more broadly. The actual services by which the whole carriage was to be performed were clearly set out in the air consignment note under the heading " Type of Service." If these services were read in conjunction with the British Overseas Airways Corporation's timetable it must have been clear to all interested parties that, whilst freight from Cairo to Asmara was to be paid to British Overseas Airways Corporation, that portion of the carriage was being undertaken by British Overseas Airways Corporation's subsidiary Aden Airways Dakota Service. The carriage clearly started as an international carriage to be performed by successive carriers as one individual carriage, and I cannot think that when the goods were transferred at Cairo to an Aden Airways plane the carriage ceased to be an international carriage as defined by article 1 (2) of the Convention and ceased to be subject to the conditions of the Convention. What was being done was, in my view, exactly what the plaintiffs contemplated would be done, or would have contemplated if they had directed their minds to the matter. I am accordingly of opinion that the whole contractual carriage from Amsterdam to Djibouti as evidenced by the air consignment note was on the face of it an international carriage by air and as such subject to the terms of the Convention.

In arriving at this conclusion I have been influenced by certain " conditions " which are printed on the back of the air consignment note: "(1) As used in this contract 'air waybill' "is equivalent to 'air consignment note,' 'shipper' is equivalent "to 'consignor,' 'carriage' is equivalent to 'transportation,' "'carrier' includes the air carrier issuing this air waybill and "all air carriers that carry the goods hereunder or perform any "other services related to such air carriage. For the purposes "of the exemption from and limitation of liability provisions "set forth or referred to herein, 'carrier' includes agents, "servants or representatives of any such air carrier. Carriage "to be performed hereunder by several successive carriers is "regarded as a single operation."

"(2) (a) Carriage hereunder is subject to the rules relating to "liability established by the Convention for the Unification of "Certain Rules relating to International Carriage by Air, signed "at Warsaw, October 12, 1929 (hereinafter called 'the "'Convention'), unless such carriage is not 'international "'carriage' as defined by the Convention. (See carrier's tariffs "for such definition.) (b) To the extent not in conflict with the "foregoing, carriage hereunder and other services performed by "each carrier are subject to (i) applicable laws (including "national laws implementing the Convention), government regu-"lations, order, and requirements, (ii) provisions herein set forth, "and (iii) applicable tariffs, rules, regulations and timetables (but "not the times of departure and arrival therein) of such carrier, "which are made part hereof and which may be inspected at any "of its offices and at airports from which it operates regular "services."

"(5) It is agreed that no time is fixed for the completion of "carriage hereunder and that carrier may without notice "substitute alternate carriers or aircraft. Carrier assumes no "obligation to carry the goods by any specified aircraft or over "any particular route or routes or to make connexion at any "point according to any particular schedule, and carrier is "hereby authorized to select, or deviate from the route or routes "of shipment, notwithstanding that the same may be stated on "the face hereof. The shipper guarantees payment of all "charges and advances."

These conditions were presumably valid and formed part of the contract of carriage in so far as they did not conflict with the terms of the Convention. The definition of "carrier" in condition 1 strongly supports the view that the second defendants were to be considered as carriers although not mentioned in the air consignment note. Condition 2 (b) (iii) showed that timetables were to be incorporated as part of the contract of carriage, and the timetable published by British Overseas Airways Corporation made it clear that the portion of the carriage from Cairo to Djibouti was to be performed by Aden Airways Dakota Service. The conditions to which I have referred did not on their face appear to conflict with any of the provisions of the Convention. If they were to be regarded as incorporated in the contract of carriage they supported the view which I have expressed, namely, that the mere fact that the portion of the carriage from Cairo to Djibouti was performed by Aden Airways did not deprive the carriage of its international character, and thus remove it from the scope of the Convention.

Article 32 of the Convention provides in terms that any clause in the contract of carriage which purports to infringe the rules laid down by the Convention, whether by deciding the law to be applied or by altering the rules as to jurisdiction, shall be null and void. This article appears to reinforce the view that article 28 (1) of the Convention, which deals with jurisdiction, was intended to be applied strictly, and I accordingly conclude that the effect of article 28 (1) is to oust the jurisdiction of the courts of this country to entertain a claim by the plaintiffs against the second defendants.

Mr. Kerr took a further point based upon the doctrine of deviation as applied in maritime law. He contended that when the second defendants failed to discharge the goods at Asmara and negligently permitted them to go on to Aden there was a deviation from the contractual voyage. He submitted that that fundamental departure from the contractual voyage entitled the plaintiffs to repudiate the contract of carriage which thus became deprived of its international character and so no longer subject to the terms of the Convention.

He contended, in substance, that wherever the word "carriage" occurred in the Convention it must be taken to refer to carriage by the service provided for in the air consignment note, and that as soon as there was, as in this case, an over carriage or miscarriage not provided for in the air consignment note and factually linked with the loss of the goods, the whole nature of the carriage was changed and ceased to be the contractual carriage covered by the Convention. For a case of over carriage by sea which was held to amount to a deviation depriving the carrier of the benefit of the exception clause, see Cunard Steamship Co. Ld. v. Buerger.[1] Whilst I was at one moment attracted by this argument, I do not think that it is sound. Whilst over carriage or miscarriage with resulting loss, such as here occurred, might constitute such wilful misconduct as would render the carrier liable for the full value of the goods lost if he were sued in the appropriate jurisdiction, I cannot see anything in the Act or the Convention which enables me to say that such over carriage or miscarriage of the goods, as here occurred, deprived the carriage of its international character so as to remove it entirely from the ambit of the Convention.

All I am here concerned with is, however, the issue whether the courts of this country have jurisdiction to entertain a claim of any kind against the second defendants. For the reasons which I have set out above I am satisfied that the plaintiffs' goods were

Pilcher J

lost upon an international carriage which was subject to the terms of the Convention. I am also satisfied that article 28 (1) of the Convention ousts the jurisdiction of the courts of this country to entertain any claim against the second defendants. Even assuming that the doctrine of deviation, as known in maritime law, applies to air carriage, and assuming that the over carriage or miscarriage, which here occurred, amounted to an unjustifiable deviation from the contractual voyage, I can find nothing in the 1932 Act or the Convention which justifies the conclusion that what occurred in this case served to remove the carriage from the ambit of the Convention or to disentitle the second defendants from relying upon the provisions of article 28 (1) of the Convention.

I am of opinion that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiffs' claim against the second defendants, and I direct that the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action against the second defendants be set aside. The second defendants will have the costs of the hearing of the summons before me.

Costs—Counsel's fees—Refresher—Computation of time by taxing master—Time spent in negotiating settlement in judge's private room and in precincts of court—R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (48).

In computing the time occupied by an action for the purpose of refresher fees to counsel the taxing master included time spent in negotiating a settlement in the precincts of the court—either in the court itself, in the absence of the judge, or in the corridor or in the judge's private room. On a summons to review the taxation:—

Held, that under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (48), the taxing master had a discretion to bring into computation the whole (or such time as he thought proper) of the time so spent. As long as the judge is in open court, or in his private room if the registrar in attendance is waiting in court for his return, the whole of such time in ordinary court hours is "time occupied by the trial" within the meaning of the rule.

SUMMONS to review taxation.

In arriving at the amount proper to be allowed as refresher fees in this action the taxing master included in his computation of time the time spent in conference in the precincts of the court, either in the court in the absence of the judge, or in the corridor, or in the judge's private room, for the purpose of arriving at a settlement of the action.

Case referred to in argument: Wright v. Bennett.[2]

Vaisey J. This is a point which arises on the question of computation of refresher fees to counsel. The matter depends on R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (48), which is in these terms: [His Lordship read it.]

The very short point which arises here is whether the total time occupied by the trial includes or does not include, first, any time spent by counsel in interviewing the judge at his invitation in his private room, or, secondly, time spent by counsel during the hours normally occupied by the trial in discussing possible compromises or settlements of the action.

In the present case, the taxing master has allowed the refresher fee on a computation of time which included, first, time spent in conference, which, I understand, means in the precincts of the court—either in the court itself, in the absence of the judge, or in the corridor—and also forty minutes in the judge's chambers which, I suppose, means his private room. Those two periods of time have been allowed by the taxing master in arriving at the amount proper to be allowed in respect of the refresher fees.

I was referred to the judgment of Denning J. in Wright v. Bennett.[1] The point in that case was whether the time actually occupied on each day included or did not include the time occupied by the midday adjournment. It was decided that the time so occupied should not be brought into computation, and that such time was not time occupied by the trial. In my judgment, that case is really no guide as to what I should decide in the present case.

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (48): "As "to refresher fees, when any cause or "matter is to be tried or heard upon "viva voce evidence in open court, "if the total time occupied by the "trial whether wholly on the first day "or partly on that day and partly on "any subsequent day or days shall "exceed a period of five hours the "Taxing Master may in respect of "the excess allow for every complete "period of five hours (if any) and for "any less period not included in any "such complete period the following "fees . . .

"The like allowances may be made "where the evidence in chief is not "taken viva voce, if the trial or "hearing shall be substantially pro-"longed beyond such period of five "hours, to be so computed as afore-"said, by the cross-examination of "witnesses whose affidavits or deposi-"tions have been used.

"Provided that in the taxation of "costs between solicitor and client "the taxing officer shall be at liberty "to allow larger fees under special "circumstances to be stated by him."

It is to be observed that the opening words of the rule "when any cause or matter is to be tried or heard" are in direct contrast to the expression following, "total time occupied "by the trial." I think that the opening words merely indicate the kind of cause or matter to which the rule applies, and are calling attention to the fact—as indeed is shown by the proviso which follows—that normally a case tried without witnesses is not covered by this rule. Of course, this is a rule which gives the taxing master a discretion, as by it he "may" allow certain fees.

What I really have to decide is whether the taxing master either had no jurisdiction to allow the fees on the footing on which he has allowed them, or whether he exercised his discretion wrongly.

In my judgment, as long as the judge is in court, either in open court or behind the scenes in his private room, if the registrar in attendance is waiting in court for the judge's return, and no other case or cause is being tried in the court or being attended to by the judge, the whole of the time in ordinary court hours may be said to be "occupied by the trial," even if some part of that time is not being used for the purposes of argument or for the hearing of evidence of witnesses.

I think that the case is very different from that decided by Denning J. to which I have referred. It seems to me that, on the words of this rule, the taxing master has a discretion to bring into computation the whole, or such part as he thinks proper, of the time spent in either of the ways I have mentioned. I think that the objections to the allowance of this particular refresher fee cannot be sustained and, therefore, that this summons must be dismissed. I do not uphold the objections, and I think that the taxing master proceeded on the right footing, and that there is no ground for interfering with the conclusion at which he has arrived.

There will be no order on the summons except that the costs of the objection and of this hearing be paid by the applicant to the respondent.

Order accordingly.

*REGINA v. WESTMINSTER COMPENSATION APPEAL TRIBUNAL AND SELL. Ex parte ROAD HAULAGE EXECUTIVE.

Nationalization—Transport—Road haulage—Compensation of employees—Claim under service agreement to damages for breach of contract—"Compensation"—Basis of assessment—Transport Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 49), s. 101—Transferred Undertakings (Compensation to Employees) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1083), reg. 3, sch. II, paras. 4, 5, 17.

The respondent S. was the managing director of a company known as Hauliers Ld., which was the holding company of eight subsidiary companies owning road transport undertakings. Hauliers Ld. did not itself carry on a road transport undertaking. S. had a service agreement with Hauliers Ld. which gave him security of tenure until February 28, 1950, at a salary and emoluments agreed at £3,250 a year. When, on April 12, 1949, the eight subsidiary undertakings were taken over by the Road Haulage Executive, pursuant to the Transport Act, 1947, the respondent's employment was terminated, and he claimed compensation under the Transferred Undertakings (Compensation to Employees) Regulations, 1950. Hauliers Ld. was not itself taken over by the executive and it went into voluntary liquidation, but by agreement the claim of S. was treated as if he were the managing director of one large operating company, and his claim was referred to the Westminster Compensation Appeals Tribunal for assessment. The tribunal held that a "right . . . to . . . compensation in the event of discharge" under paragraph 4 (1) (i) of Schedule II to the regulations included a right to claim damages for wrongful dismissal, and accordingly awarded S. compensation in respect of 10½ months, the unexpired portion of his service agreement, in accordance with paragraph 5 (2). On appeal by the executive from a judgment of the Divisional Court, approving the award and dismissing a motion for an order of certiorari to quash the award:—

Held, (1) that "compensation in the event of discharge" in paragraph 4 (1) (i) of Schedule II meant compensation in the event of lawful discharge and did not include damages for wrongful dismissal; (2) that compensation should have been assessed, therefore, under paragraph 5 (3), which applied to applicants having no right or expectation under customary practice to the payment of compensation in the event of discharge and not under paragraph 5 (2); and (3) that there was an error of law on the face of the award and it must be quashed.

Divisional Court, sub nom. Regina v. Minister of Labour and National Service, ex parte Road Haulage Executive [1952] W.N. 478; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 720; [1952] 2 All E.R. 764, reversed.

APPEAL from Divisional Court (Lord Goddard C.J., Finnemore and McNair JJ.).

On April 12, 1949, when the transport industry was nationalized, the second respondent, George James Sell, held the position of managing director of a company known as Hauliers Ld., which was the holding company of eight subsidiary companies owning road transport undertakings. He held that position under a service agreement with Hauliers Ld., by which he was entitled to a salary and allowances, totalling, it was agreed, £3,250 per annum. Pursuant to the Transport Act, 1947, the Road Haulage Executive acquired the entire shareholding of Hauliers Ld. in the subsidiary companies and also the whole of their undertakings. Hauliers Ld. thereupon went into voluntary liquidation, the respondent Sell being appointed liquidator and ceasing to be a managing director of either Hauliers Ld. or any of the subsidiary companies. He was not taken over by the Road Haulage Executive, and, accordingly, he claimed against them compensation for loss of emoluments, contending, in effect, that if the service agreement had run its full course he would have received net emoluments at the rate of £3,250 per annum until February 28, 1950.

Being dissatisfied with the amount of compensation offered by the executive, Sell appealed to the Westminster Compensation Appeal Tribunal, appointed by the Minister of Labour and National Service under the Transferred Undertakings (Compensation to Employees) Regulations, 1950, reg. 3 (3). On April 7, 1952, the tribunal made an award which included damages for wrongful dismissal, the amount being determined in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 5 (2) of Schedule II to the regulations [1] on the ground that the respondent had a "right "or expectation under customary practice to the payment of [1] Transferred Undertakings (Compensation to Employees) Regulations, 1950, Sch. II, para. 4 (1): "For the "purpose of determining whether "compensation should be awarded to "any person for loss of emoluments, "and if so the amount of that compensation, regard shall be had to— "(i) the existence in his case of any "right or expectation under customary practice to the payment of "compensation in the event of discharge, of reduction in earnings or "of worsening of conditions; (ii) the "conditions upon which he held his "appointment, including in particular its security of tenure, whether "by law or by practice; . . .

"(2) Compensation under this paragraph shall be awarded as follows:— "(i) in the case of an applicant who "has any such right or expectation as "is referred to in sub-paragraph "(1) (i) of this paragraph—(a) if "the right or expectation is to the "payment of compensation until "normal maximum retiring age, in "accordance with paragraph 5 (1) of "this schedule; (b) if the right or "expectation is to the payment of "compensation otherwise than until "normal maximum retiring age, in "accordance with paragraph 5 (2) of "this schedule; (ii) in the case of an "applicant who has no such right or "expectation as is referred to in sub-"paragraph (1) (i) of this paragraph, "in accordance with paragraph 5 (3) "of this schedule; and shall be paid "at intervals equivalent to those at "which the emoluments of the applicant were previously paid."

Para. 5 (3): "Compensation for "loss of emoluments awarded under "this sub-paragraph shall, subject to "the provisions thereof, be payable "for a period of 13 weeks (inclusive "of any period in respect of which "interim payments of compensation "have been made) or in the case of "an applicant aged over 45, of 13 "weeks (inclusive of any such period "as aforesaid) extended by an additional period of one week for every "completed year of whole time service since he attained the age of 45 "subject to a maximum addition of "13 such periods: . . ."

Para. 17: "There shall be set off "against the interim compensation "payment or the compensation award "made to a claimant any payments "for breach of contract to which he "may be entitled arising out of any "service agreement or contract."

"compensation in the event of discharge" within the meaning of paragraph 4 (1) (i) of the schedule.

The executive admitted that Sell had a right to claim damages for wrongful dismissal, but they contended that such a right was not comprised within the term "compensation" in the regulations, and that compensation was payable only under paragraph 5 (3) of Schedule II. They therefore moved the Divisional Court for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the award.

On October 21, 1952, the Divisional Court dismissed the motion, and the Executive now appealed.

Sir Frank Soskice Q.C., T. F. Southall and Robin Day for the Executive.

L. Caplan for the respondent.

The appeal, which started before three Lords Justices, was by consent, owing to the illness of Somervell L.J., continued and concluded before two judges.

On February 23 the following judgments were read.

Denning L.J., having stated the facts, continued:—Mr. Sell claims compensation for his loss of office. He was not strictly entitled under the Transport Act, 1947, to compensation, because Hauliers Ld. were not themselves carrying on a road transport undertaking, but it was agreed between the parties that he should be treated as if he was a person entitled to compensation. The case has to be treated, therefore, on a hypothetical basis, as if Hauliers Ld. themselves operated the road transport undertakings of the eight subsidiaries and as if Mr. Sell was the managing director of one large operating company. I am not sure that this hypothetical state of affairs has not been the cause of some of the difficulties which have arisen in this case.

At any rate, Mr. Sell claimed compensation for the unexpired portion of his service agreement, that is the 10½ months from April 12, 1949, to February 28, 1950. The British Transport Commission, who are the compensating authority, decided that compensation should only be payable for at most six months. Mr. Sell appealed to the Compensation Appeal Tribunal, who decided that it should be payable for the 10½ months claimed by Mr. Sell. The Road Haulage Executive then applied to the High Court for an order of certiorari to quash the award of the tribunal on the ground that it contained an error of law on the face of it (Rex v. Northumberland Compensation Appeal Tribunal [1]). The Divisional Court found that there was no error and refused to quash the award. The Road Haulage Executive now appeal to this court.

The real question involved in this appeal is what is the proper basis of assessing compensation. The compensation regulations lay down three scales. Mr. Sell says that he is entitled to compensation on the second scale. The Road Haulage Executive say that he is entitled to compensation on the third scale. To make these scales intelligible, I must describe the way in which the regulations work.

When the road haulage system was nationalized, the British Transport Commission took over the contracts which the hauliers had made for the purposes of the carrying on of their undertakings. Those contracts included all the contracts for personal service which the hauliers had made with the men who worked in the business. Those men included all the working staff, from the managing director at the top down to the lorry drivers and garage hands at the bottom. The Commission could not be expected to give every man precisely the same work as he had done before, but they had to give him work which was reasonably comparable to it. The Commission were to select the work, and then the man had no choice but to accept it, provided, of course, that it was reasonably comparable to what he had done previously. It sometimes happened that the Commission had no work available for a man which was reasonably comparable to what he had done before. They could then dispense with his services, but if they did so they had to pay him compensation. In dispensing with his services, they had to give him the proper notice required by his contract or else pay him damages. But even if they did give him proper notice, they still had to pay him compensation for his loss of employment. The Minister of Transport made regulations on the point (S.I. 1950, No. 1083) which divide the men into three categories. The first category (no one now suggests that Mr. Sell was in this category) consists of those men who, under their previous employment, in the event of discharge, had a "right or expectation under customary "practice to the payment of compensation," this compensation being payable "until normal maximum retiring age" of 65. If a man in this category is discharged by the Commission, he is entitled to be compensated by an annual sum until he reaches 65. The amount depends on his length of service, but is not to be more than two-thirds of his current emoluments.

The second category (the one in which Mr. Sell claims to be) consists of those men who, under their previous employment, had, in the event of discharge, a "right or expectation under "customary practice to the payment of compensation." This category is just the same as the first category, but with this difference, that, instead of the compensation being payable until normal maximum retiring age, it is payable "otherwise than "until normal maximum retiring age." If a man in this category is discharged by the Commission, he is entitled to be

1953
REGINA v. WESTMINSTER COMPENSATION APPEAL TRIBUNAL. Ex parte ROAD HAULAGE EXECUTIVE.
Denning L.J.

compensated by a weekly sum for an indefinite period, not less, however, than 13 weeks, nor after he reaches the age of 65. The amount is not to be more than two-thirds of his weekly wages and is to stop when he "ceases to suffer loss of emoluments."

The third category (the one which the Road Haulage Executive say applies to Mr. Sell) consists of those men who had no such right or expectation as those in the first two categories. If a man in this category is discharged by the Commission, he is entitled to be compensated by a weekly sum for a period of not less than 13 weeks nor more than 26 weeks, the actual period depending on his age and length of service. The amount is not to be more than two-thirds of his weekly wages. We are not here concerned with the amount of compensation. I can see that that will involve some difficult questions for somebody. We are concerned only to place the men into their appropriate categories.

The first category gives rise to no difficulty. It applies only to those men who under their previous employment, if they had been discharged before reaching the age of 65, would have received compensation until they reached 65. "Compensation" in this connexion obviously means a periodic sum payable, every week, month, or year, as the case may be, until the man reaches 65. It does not include a right to damages at law for wrongful dismissal, because that is never payable "until normal maximum "retiring age."

The second category gives rise to the question in this case. Sir Frank Soskice, on behalf of the Road Haulage Executive, says that it includes only those men who, under their previous employment, in the event of discharge, would have received a definite or ascertainable sum by way of compensation for loss of office or employment, such sum being payable either by a lump sum, or by periodic instalments until some age short of 65 years. But Mr. Caplan, on behalf of Mr. Sell, says that it includes all those men who under their previous employment, in the event of discharge without notice, would have had a right at law to damages for wrongful dismissal. In short, Mr. Caplan says that "compensation in the event of discharge" includes damages for wrongful dismissal, whereas Sir Frank Soskice says that it includes only a definite or ascertainable sum or sums.

I feel compelled to reject Mr. Caplan's contention for the simple reason that, if it were right, every man would come into the first or second categories and no one into the third category at all. I say this because the regulations themselves apply only to men who have been continuously engaged from January 1, 1940, in whole-time service for a road haulier. In order to be "whole "time service" the employment must have been such that the man was "required to devote on the average not less than 30 "hours per week" to his work. Every one of the men so engaged would be entitled to reasonable notice, which would be at least a week's notice; and, in the event of discharge without notice, he would be entitled to damages for wrongful dismissal. Every one of them would, therefore, on Mr. Caplan's contention, have a right "to the payment of compensation in the event of "discharge" and would come into the first or second category. That cannot be right, because it gives no content to the third category at all. In order to give any meaning to the third category, it must consist of all those men who, under their previous employment, in the event of discharge, would have had no right to be paid any compensation (i.e., a definite or ascertainable sum or sums) but at most only a right to damages for wrongful dismissal.

Another reason why I reject Mr. Caplan's contention is that the regulations themselves show that "compensation" does not include a right to damages for wrongful dismissal. In assessing compensation, the compensating authority is directed to have regard, in paragraph 4 (1) (i) of the Second Schedule, to a right to "compensation in the event of discharge," and in paragraph 4 (1) (ii) to the "conditions upon which he held "his appointment, including in particular its security of "tenure, whether by law or by practice." A right to damages for wrongful dismissal clearly comes under paragraph 4 (1) (ii) and not 4 (1) (i). In other words, it is not "compensa-"tion." Again, in paragraph 17 it is provided that there shall be set off against the compensation "any payments for breach "of contract" arising out of any service agreement or contract. That shows that payments for breach of contract are not regarded as "compensation." Finally, in the first category of men, "compensation" clearly does not include damages for breach of contract.

Mr. Caplan said that injustice would result if we adopted any view other than that for which he contended. I cannot see this. Mr. Caplan admits that there is no injustice in the case of men whose contracts of service are taken over by the Commission. If such a man is given proper notice, he has, of course, no claim to damages but he gets compensation. If he is not given proper notice, he gets damages or compensation, whichever is the greater. Mr. Caplan urged, however, that there would be injustice in the case of a man whose contract of service was not taken over by the Commission. I find it difficult to visualize such a case. I should have thought that, in the case of every whole-time man, there was always some work in the Commission which was reasonably comparable to what he had done before, and that the Commission were bound to take him over and provide it for him under section 45 (3) (f) of the Transport Act, 1947. The only men whom I can visualize as not being taken over are those who are engaged by a composite company, partly in the haulage business and partly in some other business. Their contracts of personal service might not vest in the Commission because the terms or subject-matter might make it impossible for them to have effect with the Commission: see the opening words of section 45 (3). But in that case the contracts would remain in force with the composite company. They would not be frustrated, and if a man were dismissed in breach of his contract he would have an action for damages against the composite company. He would, therefore, not suffer injustice. But if there are any cases where injustice might be done (and I can at present see none) I think that they are so few that we ought not to allow them to affect our judgment as to the true construction of the regulations.

My conclusion, therefore, is that "compensation in the event "of discharge" means compensation in the event of lawful discharge and does not include damages for wrongful dismissal. I realize, of course, that in this particular case Mr. Sell may not have a claim to damages either against the Commission or against Hauliers Ld., but that is because this case is being treated on a hypothetical basis. It has been argued on the assumption that Hauliers Ld. were engaged in the road haulage business themselves and that Mr. Sell was the managing director of that business. If that had been true, the contract with Mr. Sell would have been taken over by the Commission and he would have had a right to damages from the Commission. The reason why this contract has not, in fact, been taken over is that Hauliers Ld. is only a holding company which is not itself engaged in the road haulage business.

Looking at the decision of the tribunal in the light of this section, I think that there is an error of law on the face of it. The tribunal said that Mr. Sell "had the legal right of a servant "whose service agreement is prematurely determined by a "voluntary liquidation, namely, in the absence of special circum-"stances, to damages for breach of contract. Such damages "are comprehended in the term 'compensation' in those "regulations." I think that that is erroneous. I am of opinion that damages for breach of contract are not comprehended in the term "compensation," and that Mr. Sell is not entitled to compensation on the second scale, but only on the third scale.

I need hardly say that I differ from the Divisional Court with much hesitation, but I gather that the case was much more fully argued before us than it was before that court. Indeed, the reasoning of that court contains no reference to the argument which has found favour with us. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, and the award of the tribunal quashed.

Romer L.J. The question at issue on this appeal is whether the phrase "any right . . . to the payment of compensation in "the event of discharge" in paragraph 4 (1) (i) of Schedule II to the Transferred Undertakings (Compensation to Employees) Regulations, 1950, is referable only to a right to compensation contractually payable to an employee when his employment is lawfully determined, or whether it includes also his inchoate right to damages in the event of his being wrongfully dismissed.

This question appears to me to be purely one of construction of the regulations in question read, as they must be, in the light of the Transport Act, 1947, by itself. I find no assistance in the solution of this problem from previous cases in which the courts have been called upon to construe the word "compensation"; suffice it to say that in some contexts it has been held to include damages, whilst in others it has been held not to include them, and that none of the contexts was comparable to that in which the word appears in the present case.

Sir Frank Soskice, for the appellants, in his argument before us, drew our attention to a very material fact which does not seem to have been emphasized before the Divisional Court. Mr. Sell's claim to compensation was (or has been treated as being) that of an "existing officer or servant" who had, in consequence of the transfer to the Commission of a haulage undertaking by a notice of acquisition, suffered direct pecuniary loss by reason of the dispensing by the Commission with his services (regulation 3); and it is indeed only to "existing officers or servants" that paragraph 4 of the Second Schedule is applicable at all. By virtue of regulation 1, no employee of a haulage undertaking could qualify as an "existing officer or servant" unless he had been employed since January 1, 1940, on employment to which he was required to devote on the average not less than 30 hours per week, during which he was not at liberty to undertake other work for remuneration. It appears to me to be of the highest importance to bear in mind that it is only officers or servants who possess these qualifications who are entitled to an award under paragraph 4. This paragraph divides such officers and servants into two categories, viz., those who had "any right or expectation "under customary practice to the payment of compensation in "the event of discharge," and those who had not; and the award in favour of members of the first of these categories varies according to whether their right or expectation is to the payment of compensation until normal maximum retiring age, on the one hand, or otherwise than until normal maximum retiring age, on the other.

How, then, do these various provisions fit in with the conception presented by the respondent—that the "right" referred to in paragraph 4 includes the right of the officers and servants in question to receive payment of compensation in the event of wrongful dismissal? In my judgment, it is difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile the provisions with any such idea. Having regard to the definition of "whole time service" in regulation 1, every officer and servant capable of qualifying for an award was necessarily employed under a contract of service which could only lawfully be determined by the employers giving at least one week's notice of discharge. Every one of such officers and servants accordingly had, during the subsistence of his contract, an inchoate right to damages in the event of his dismissal without notice. On this view, paragraph 4 of the second schedule was, on the respondent's contention, attributing to some only of the officers and servants the possession of a right which was, in fact, enjoyed by all; and if it was enjoyed by all no effect could apparently be given to paragraph 4 (2) (ii) or to its satellite paragraph 5 (3).

Mr. Caplan, for the respondent, sought to evade this result by arguing that these latter provisions were introduced to sweep up any contracts of a special character under which employees, while satisfying the "whole time service" requirement, could yet be summarily discharged without any right to damages. He was unable, however, to give any satisfactory illustration of such a contract, and I am unable to accept the argument. Assuming that the word "discharge" may in general include both lawful discharge and unlawful dismissal, full effect can be given to the whole of paragraph 4 by confining the scope of the word as therein used to lawful discharge, without including wrongful dismissal as well, and the fact that the wider construction renders, as in my opinion it does render, nugatory and ineffective the provisions of paragraphs 4 (1) (ii) and 5 (3) of the Second Schedule affords, in my judgment, a very sufficient reason for rejecting it. It is further to be observed, as my Lord has pointed out, that the word "right" in paragraph 4 (2) (i) (a) cannot, on any reasonable view, include a right to damages.

For the above reasons, even if they stood alone, I should be disposed to conclude that the right to compensation envisaged by paragraph 4 means a contractual right and nothing else. The matter does not, however, rest there. It is provided by paragraph 17 of the Second Schedule that "there shall be set off "against the interim compensation payment or the compensa-"tion award made to a claimant any payments for breach of "contract to which he may be entitled arising out of any service "agreement or contract." It is clear, I think, that the payments for breach of contract to which this paragraph refers are, or at all events include, sums paid or recovered by way of damages by an officer or servant for wrongful dismissal. If so, certain conclusions necessarily follow. The first is that the regulations were visualising that the operation of the Transport Act, 1947, might in some cases give rise to claims by employees for the wrongful determination of their service contracts. The second is that the existence of such claims was regarded as an element wholly apart from the considerations specified and enumerated in paragraph 4 (1) (i) to (vii) as being relevant to the question whether an award should be made at all and, if so, of its amount. The third is that a clear distinction was being drawn in paragraph 17 between compensation awarded under the Act and regulations on the one hand, and damages paid for the wrongful determination of service contracts on the other.

These factors strongly confirm, as I think, that a right to damages for wrongful dismissal is altogether outside the purview of the "right . . . to the payment of compensation in the "event of discharge" referred to in paragraph 4. If a man's contract was determined without notice, then his right to compensation from the Commission, or (possibly) from his former employers, was left unaffected by the regulations, subject to the stipulation that if, whether by action or negotiation, he received a payment in satisfaction of his claim, the payment was to be brought into account in quantifying an award made to him under the Act. To say that such right as he might have to a payment of this nature is included in the rights referred to in paragraph 4 is, in my opinion, to adopt a view which is irreconcilable with the provisions of that paragraph, when taken as a whole, and is in conflict with the language of paragraph 17.

For the above reasons I am unable to arrive at the same conclusion on this matter as that which commended itself to the Divisional Court. Mr. Caplan urged upon us that if the appellant's argument were accepted manifest hardships would result. He instanced the case of a manager who lost his job without notice by reason of his contract of service not being taken over by the Commission; such a man, it was said, would have no remedy against the Commission, nor could he proceed against his former employer who, having lost his undertaking through force majeure, would be exonerated by the "frustration" principle from being answerable to his manager. Unless, so it was argued, his right to damages was provided for by paragraph 4, he would lose it altogether and merely receive the lowest form of compensation under the regulations. It may be that such a case might possibly arise. None, however, so far as I know, has occurred up to now, and I venture to think that it is unlikely that one will arise, principally because it is very difficult to think of a service contract the terms or subject-matter of which "make "it impossible that it should have effect as modified in the "manner provided by" section 45 (3) of the Act and would yet result in the servant losing his employment if his contract were not taken over by the Commission.

Mr. Caplan also suggested further hardships and anomalies which would arise if we were to accede to the appellant's argument. I do not propose to consider them in detail for, assuming their existence, I think that there is a two-fold answer to any submission founded upon them. In the first place, if the language in which the legislature has expressed itself leads with reasonable certainty to a particular result, that result cannot be displaced merely because it gives rise to anomalies; and, secondly, if anomalies or hardships emerge which call for redress, I know of no reason why the Minister should not, if he thinks proper, provide for them by issuing further regulations under section 101 of the Act.

*SURREY COUNTY COUNCIL v. MINISTRY OF EDUCATION.

Local Authority — Education — Transport for pupils — Travelling expenses—Proposal to pay to parents only a sum sufficient to carry child to within walking distance of school and home—"Transport "to and from school"—Education Act, 1944 (7 & 8 Geo. 6, c. 31), ss. 39 (2) (c); 55 (1) (2).

A local education authority, who had arranged for the transport to school of children living more than three miles from school, proposed that the full cost of transport by public conveyance to and from school should no longer be paid for secondary school children, but that expenditure should be limited to partial payment of fares in such a way that no child had a longer distance than three miles to and three miles from school to travel unaided, and that parents of such children living more than three miles from their school should be paid a sum equal to the cost of the fare necessary to bring the child within the three-mile limit. On an originating summons taken out by the authority asking whether they were authorized by section 55 of the Education Act, 1944,[1] to make the proposed arrangements:—

[1] Education Act, 1944, s. 39: "(1) If any child of compulsory school "age . . . fails to attend regularly ". . . the parent . . . shall be guilty "of an offence. . . . (2) In any pro- "ceedings for an offence against this "section . . . the child shall not be "deemed to have failed to attend "regularly at the school . . . (c) if "the parent proves that the school at "which the child is a registered pupil "is not within walking distance of "the child's home, and that no suit- "able arrangements have been made "by the local education authority . . . "for his transport to and from the "school. . . . (5) In this section . . . "'walking distance' means, in rela- "tion to a child who has not attained "the age of eight years, two miles, "and in the case of any other child, "three miles. . . ."

S. 55, as amended by the Education Act, 1948: "(1) A local educa- "tion authority shall make such "arrangements for the provision "of transport and otherwise as "they consider necessary or as the "Minister may direct for the purpose "of facilitating the attendance of "pupils at schools . . . and any trans- "port provided in pursuance of such "arrangements shall be provided free "of charge. (2) A local education "authority may pay the whole or any "part, as the authority think fit, of "the reasonable travelling expenses "of any pupil in attendance at any "school . . . for whose transport no "arrangements are made under this "section."

Held, that "transport" in section 39 (2) (c) clearly meant transport to and from school and the home, and the obligation imposed on a local education authority by section 55 (1) was to make arrangements for such transport, either by their own vehicles or other means; that section 55 (2) imposed on the authority the obligation, where no transport under section 55 (1) was provided, to provide a substitute for such transport which must be of the same character, and that, therefore, substitute for transport in the shape of payment for public transport must provide for the payment of a sum to cover the cost of conveying the child by public transport from a point reasonably near his home to a point reasonably near his school. The authority, accordingly, were not authorized by section 55 to make the proposed arrangements, nor were the arrangements "suitable arrangements" within the meaning of section 39 (2) (c).

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

The Surrey County Council, in the capacity of the local education authority for the county of Surrey, maintained primary and secondary schools pursuant to the provisions of the Education Acts, 1944 to 1948, and their arrangements, under section 55 of the Act, for the provision of transport for the purpose of facilitating the attendance of pupils at their schools were in some cases to provide special vehicles to take pupils to and from school, and in other cases, where a pupil travelled by a public transport vehicle, the usual course was to provide the pupil, free of charge, with a travel voucher. Except in special circumstances, secondary school pupils did not travel by public transport at the council's expense unless they lived at least three miles from the school which they were expected to attend.

By a circular, No. 242 of December 7, 1951, addressed to all local education authorities, the Minister of Education stated that she found it necessary to ask for a reduction in the expenditure on school transport, which had been steadily rising and had reached a figure of over £4,000,000. The circular stated: "In a "number of areas children are being conveyed free to school over "distances less than the statutory minima laid down in section "39 (5) of the Education Act, 1944. In present circumstances "the Minister of Education does not regard this as justifiable, "though she will be prepared to consider quite exceptional cases "where the authority can satisfy her that special justification "exists—e.g., because of serious traffic dangers and the special "needs of handicapped children."

Having considered that circular, the education committee of the council made three proposals which were approved by the council in March, 1952. The first two proposals limited the classes of children living within three miles of their school who would be conveyed to school or assisted with their fares. The third of the proposals was that the full cost of transport by public conveyance to and from school should no longer be paid for secondary school children, but that expenditure should be limited to partial payment of fares in such a way that no child had a longer distance than three miles to and three miles from school to travel unaided. The council proposed that parents should be paid a sum equal to the cost of the fare necessary to bring the child within the three-mile limit, special cases of hardship being considered on their merits. It was estimated that the annual reduction in expenditure on the part of the council by the adoption of that proposal would be approximately £20,000 in a full financial year.

After the council had approved the proposals their attention was drawn by officers of the Ministry to the fact that a proposal similar to the council's third proposal had been put into operation in 1950 by the Thanet Divisional Executive, acting on behalf of the Kent County Council. The council were given to understand that, as a result of complaints made by parents, in April, 1951, the Minister of Education, relying on the powers of direction conferred by section 55 (1) of the Education Act, 1944, had issued a directive that the arrangements to be made by the Thanet Divisional Executive under section 55 (1) for the provision of transport of pupils at schools should provide for transport without cost to the parents from the bus stop nearest to the pupil's home to the bus stop nearest to the school.

The fact that the Minister had issued such a direction was not known to the council at the time when they approved the proposals, and accordingly on May 23, 1952, the chief education officer to the council wrote to the secretary of the Ministry of Education setting out the council's proposals, and asking whether the Minister would "follow her predecessor's policy or whether, "having regard to the present circumstances of the country as "defined in circular 242, she will not give any direction to the "authority in the matter." A reply to that letter dated July 1, 1952, stated that the Minister could not accept the council's third proposal. Later, on July 28, 1952, the Minister received a deputation from the council. In the course of her discussion with the deputation the Minister stated that she had been advised that the council's third proposal was contrary to the provisions of the Act, and that, with that advice before her, she could not exclude the possibility of having to give a direction, as her predecessor had done in Kent, if the council put the scheme into operation and an appeal was made to her by an aggrieved parent.

Following that meeting, the council took legal advice, and although of the opinion that the proposal ought to be put into operation, felt no longer at liberty to do so because, in view of the Minister's attitude, to put the third proposal into operation might, by virtue of regulation 15 of the Education (Local Education Authorities) Grant Regulations, 1948, jeopardize the council's right to receive Exchequer grants in respect of the expenditure incurred.

No question arose regarding the first two proposals, which were approved by the Minister, but the council took out an originating summons to have determined—(1) Whether on the true construction of section 55 of the Education Act, 1944 (as amended), they were authorized to make the arrangements comprised in their third proposal; and (2) whether such arrangements were suitable arrangements within the meaning of section 39 (2) (c) of the Act for the transport of a child to and from the school at which he was a registered pupil.

J. P. Ashworth for the Ministry.

No cases were cited in argument.

LYNSKEY J. This is an originating summons brought by the Surrey County Council against the Ministry of Education in which two questions are submitted to the court arising out of the obligations of the Surrey County Council, as the education authority, for the provision of transport or the substitute for transport for children over 12 years of age attending secondary schools in the council's area; the same considerations, so far as the council's obligations are concerned, also apply to children over eight years of age.

[His Lordship stated the facts substantially as set out above and continued:] The answer to the questions submitted for the consideration of the court depends (and depends entirely) upon the construction primarily of section 55 of the 1944 Act as amended by the Act of 1948, and secondly upon the construction of section 39, and in addition, of course, upon the context in which the sections appear. By "context" I mean the general scheme of the Act as indicated by its terms. As I understand the Act, it imposes upon an education authority the obligation to provide education of different standards. I am concerned here particularly with primary education, which the council has to provide within the confines of its jurisdiction; that is a mandatory obligation imposed by the Act upon the local education authority.

Under the scheme of the Act the local education authority originally had to submit schemes for the Minister's approval and the council did submit such schemes. Section 11 (2) (g) of the Act required such schemes to give information as to "measures "which the authority propose to take in fulfilment of their duty "to secure the provision of schools for providing primary and "secondary education, such as the making of general arrange-"ments for the transport of pupils to and from school." The taking of such measures, apparently, is one of the primary obligations imposed upon the education authority.

The Act having first, as I have said, imposed a duty upon the education authority to provide schools and instruction, goes on to impose an equal duty upon parents of the children to see that their children take advantage of the educational facilities provided. Section 36 provides: "It shall be the duty of the Surrey County Council v. Ministry of Education.

Lynskey J.

" parent of every child of compulsory school age to cause him " to receive efficient full-time education suitable to his age, " ability, and aptitude, either by regular attendance at school or " otherwise." If the child is not at school, section 37 provides for the making of a school attendance order, and imposes upon the parent the obligation of sending the child to the school of which such school attendance order requires him to be a registered pupil.

Section 39 is concerned with the obligation of the parent to send his child to school and is similar to a section in the earlier Act which was known as the truancy section.

[His Lordship read section 39 (1), (2) (c) and (5) and continued:] On the face of section 39, if a parent did not send his child to school, and the child lived outside the three-mile radius of the school, and no transport was provided for him, the parent would be excused from sending his child to school, and for his non-attendance. On behalf of the council it is said that, although that may be possibly the prima facie meaning of the words, their obligation is imposed by section 55 and not by section 39. [His Lordship read section 55 and continued:] The council argue that they have not made the arrangements in question under subsection (1) of section 55 because arrangements under subsection (1) are " arrangements for the provision of " transport and otherwise "—not " or otherwise "—and I think that it is conceded by the council (and if not, it is clearly my view) that subsection (1) of section 55 relates to the actual provision of transport as such, either with hired vehicles or their own vehicles or by other means—maybe by providing a short cut over some obstacle which would make the distance more than three miles, and reducing it to under three miles.

They contend that this scheme is not for the provision of transport in the sense required by subsection (1), but is a scheme made under subsection (2) of section 55 for the provision of the cost of the child using public transport; and as such provision can only be made in the case of a child for whose transport no arrangements are made under the section, it seems clear that no arrangements for transport have been made in the case of the children for whom the scheme is intended to provide, but that the scheme is to pay the reasonable travelling expenses, either in whole or in part, of the children who live more than three miles away from the school at which they are registered pupils.

The council are saying, in effect, that they have a discretion as to what they shall pay. They have to make arrangements for facilitating the attendance of pupils at school, and the argument on their behalf is that by their scheme they are providing payment in respect of the child's transport which will enable the child to reach the school by walking less than three miles. The council, therefore, say that they are within the wording of section 55 (1) and (2) in that they are providing reasonable arrangements for the provision of transport or substitution for the provision of transport by payment.

The case put forward on behalf of the Minister is that, if section 55 stood alone, and apart from anything else in the Act, that is a possible construction and a possible view; but it is argued that if that view is adopted it will result in a scheme which will not prevent the parent from taking advantage of the provisions of section 39 (2) (c) if proceedings are taken against him for truancy; and it is said that a scheme with such results is obviously not a suitable arrangement within the words of section 55. Mr. Williams agreed that if the scheme would leave it open to the parent of a child residing outside the three-mile radius to take advantage of that excuse, it could not be considered a proper scheme within the meaning of section 55.

My view is that this case really turns upon the interpretation of section 39 (2) (c) and (5). The question is: Has the council made suitable arrangements for the transport to and from the school of the child who lives more than three miles from the school?—and "to and from the school" in that context means from and to the child's home to and from the school. If it becomes a question of transport to and from the school, I should have thought that that could have only one meaning. Provision has to be made, if the child lives more than three miles distant from his school, for transport between the school and the home. It seems to me that to suggest that transport to a point two miles away from the school—which would mean not transport to the school, but transport half-way to the school—cannot be read into those words.

The words appear to me to be clear. Transport has to be provided to and from the school as from the home. That is the obligation as to transport, and in this case the scheme is to provide a substitute for transport by payment, but in my view the reasoning applicable to the provision of transport must apply equally to payment as a substitute for transport. If in fact the obligation is to provide transport to and from the school when the child is resident more than three miles away from the school, then equally I am satisfied that the substitute for transport in the shape of payment for public transport must be of the same character, and must provide for payment of the sum which will cover the cost of taking the child by public transport from a point reasonably near his home to a point reasonably near the school—I do not say to the school door, but reasonably near thereto.

In those circumstances, on my view of the law, the answer which I must give to the first question is that on the true construction of section 55 of the Education Act, 1944, as amended by the Act of 1948, the council are not authorized to make such arrangements as they propose. On the second question I accept the answer which has been suggested to me by Mr. Ashworth, that the proposed arrangements as a matter of law are not suitable arrangements within the meaning of section 39 (2) (c).

* KLUCINSKI v. KLUCINSKI.

Lord Merriman P. and Collingwood J.

Husband and Wife — Justices — Maintenance — Quantum — Earning capacity.

In assessing the amount of maintenance which a husband should be ordered to pay under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895–1949, the justices should take into account, as in the High Court, not merely the husband's actual earnings, but his earning capacity. Such earning capacity includes the amount which he is capable of earning from overtime.

APPEAL from the justices for the Borough of Mansfield.

On an application by a wife for a maintenance order, the justices held on October 22, 1952, that her husband had committed adultery and had been guilty of desertion, and made an order accordingly. The husband's net weekly wage from his employment at Bilsthorp Colliery, after deducting income tax, national health contribution, etc., between July, 1952, and the hearing of the summons was between £11 8s. and £12 16s. Those figures included pay for overtime; the basic wage was between £9 and £10 a week. The justices made an order of 30s. a week for the wife, and of 15s. for the child of the marriage. A further child was born in January, 1953, and an order was in fact made in respect of that child for 20s. a week under the Guardianship of Infants Acts.

The wife appealed against the amount of maintenance ordered for herself; there was no cross-appeal upon the findings of fact which were admitted to be true. In their reasons the justices said: "Experience in dealing with such cases has shown us that "if we base the amount of our order on such figures [i.e., "including overtime] the man more often than not stops working "overtime as he feels he has no longer any incentive to do so."

The husband did not appear and was not represented.

LORD MERRIMAN P. stated the facts and said:—On the face of those facts I am bound to say that it does not strike me that for an injured wife, a woman who has been treated as this woman has been treated, 30s. is a very lavish award. The justices explain that in this way: They say, taking the lower figure, £11 8s., that it includes considerable earnings in respect of overtime. That is fairly obvious. They say that the basic wage is between £9 and £10 a week. That may or may not be so; the figure is not challenged, and I will assume that it is right. But I think that they have gone wrong in a matter of principle, and I think it is necessary that we should make that clear. [His Lordship quoted the reason already stated above and continued:]

To my mind, that is a plain misdirection in law. It is elementary law in this connexion that in assessing the amount of maintenance justices ought to take into account, just as we are bound to do here, not merely actual earnings but earning capacity. Therefore, to make a deduction from wages actually earned because some of it represents overtime and because, if that figure is taken into account, the man will cease to work overtime, is to say in effect: "We will not take any account, not merely of "his earning capacity, but of the fact that he has chosen to "exercise his capacity to earn." That must be wrong, and on that account I think that it is clearly open to us to interfere with this order. The only question is: What is the best way to do it?

The question, strictly viewed, is: What was the proper figure to award last October? Whereas the practical issue is: What is the proper amount to award now if the total amount that she is receiving is not, in fact, enough? It is very seldom advantageous, unless the resulting figure is absolutely clear, to send the case back merely for consideration afresh when by a summons issued tomorrow the aggrieved party can obtain a review of the figures upwards or downwards on the ground that the amount is now shown to be too little or too much, as the case may be; for, as has been explained over and over again, the result of comparatively recent legislation is that it is no longer necessary, on the pure question of amount, to produce "fresh evidence" in the sense in which those words have been interpreted. To put it quite shortly, it is sufficient to show that experience has proved that the amount is too little or too much, as the case may be.

We are not really in a position to decide upon that point, because, apart altogether from the question how much, if any, of this weekly figure represents what I call earning capacity as distinct from the actual basic figure of the husband's wage, there is also the question of the wife's earning capacity, always assuming (which I must not be taken to be assuming against her) that it is right in the circumstances of this case, particularly with a new infant child, that she should, so to speak, be forced to go out to work.

In a word, the obvious solution of this matter is to leave the wife, if it proves to be that she has not sufficient to live on under the two orders, to go to the justices and ask for a revision, and I hope that the justices, if that arises, will take note of the view which I am expressing that it is wrong to eliminate overtime pay, or the capacity to earn it, from their calculations.

With these observations I think that the matter may safely be left to the wife and her advisers to take such action as is necessary to obtain any revision of this amount which is thought to be necessary.

COLLINGWOOD J. I agree. In my opinion the justices have misdirected themselves. The criterion here is capacity to earn, and they have deliberately excluded that from their consideration. There is not the material before this court to enable us to assess the amount, and I agree to what the President has said, that it is not a practical solution to send the case back for the magistrates to assess the amount as at October, 1952, which would be what they would have to do. Circumstances have changed since then, and I agree that the best solution is for the wife, if and when she finds the existing amount to be inadequate, to go back to the justices for it to be increased.

[1952 M. 1345.]

Landlord and Tenant—Rent restriction—Flat with services—Option to grant new lease in original form—Rent reduced by tribunal—Option exercised—Refusal to grant new lease—Whether option valid—Contract—Legality—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (9 & 10 Geo. 6, c. 34), ss. 2, 4 (1), 9.

Landlords leased to a tenant a flat for seven years from June 24, 1946, at a rent of £525 per annum, and covenanted to provide certain services. By a deed dated March 30, 1949 the landlords granted the tenant an option, to be exercised on or before June 24, 1952, to take a new lease of the flat from June 24, 1953, in the form of the existing lease. On the tenant's application, a rent tribunal on January 23, 1950, exercising powers under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, reduced the rent to £425 per annum. On December 4, 1951, the tenant exercised the option. The landlords refused to grant the new lease, alleging that as a result of the tribunal's decision and the subsequent entry of the lower rent in the register they were prohibited by the Act from requiring or receiving a rent of £525 as expressly stipulated in the deed and accordingly the option was null and void:—

Held, first, that the granting of a future lease at a rent of £525 would not of necessity involve illegality because, if an application were made to the tribunal to reconsider the rent, they would have power to increase it.

Held, secondly, that a mere covenant in a lease to pay rent in excess of the amount permitted was not a requirement in the sense in which the word "require" was used in section 4 of the Act, which provided that "it shall not be lawful to require . . . payment "of any sum in excess of the rent" entered in the register, although any attempt to enforce the covenant would be a requirement within the section.

Held, thirdly, that, in any event, such a covenant would not render the whole lease void.

The tenant was accordingly entitled to a declaration that the option was valid and subsisting and that it was duly exercised by his notice of December 4, 1951.

ACTION.

By a lease, dated December 14, 1946, the defendants demised to the plaintiff flat C1, Durley Chine Court, Bournemouth, for a term of seven years from June 24, 1946, at a rent of £525 per annum inclusive, and as an additional rent an amount equivalent to any increase in the rates which the defendants might be obliged to pay during the term. The lease included a covenant by the lessors to provide central heating and hot water.

As one of the terms of a compromise of disputes which had arisen between the parties, the defendants granted to the plaintiff an option by an agreement under seal dated March 30, 1949, which provided, inter alia:—"(1) In pursuance of the said term "of settlement and in consideration of the compromise the lessee "shall have the option of taking a lease of the several rooms and "bathrooms and servants offices known as flat No. C.1 on the "second floor of the building known as Durley Chine Court "Bournemouth in the County of Hants for a term of seven years "from June 24, 1953, at the yearly rent of £525 such lease to be "in the form of the existing lease of the said premises dated "[December 14, 1953] and made between the lessors of the one "part and the lessee of the other part. . . . (4) The said option "shall be exercisable by notice in writing to the lessors at any "time before or on June 24, 1952, and if and when the same shall "be exercised then the lessors shall forthwith grant and the "tenant shall accept a lease of the said flat on the said terms of "the said premises to commence from June 24, 1953."

On the plaintiff's application the Bournemouth Rent Tribunal, exercising their powers under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, on January 23, 1950, reduced the rent from £525 to £425 for the duration of the Act. On December 4, 1951, the plaintiff sent to the defendants a notice exercising the option. The defendants refused to grant the lease.

Mauray v. Durley Chine (Investments) Ld.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the option was valid and subsisting and that it was duly exercised by his notice of December 4, 1951. The defendants in their defence pleaded: "(5) As a result of the said decision of the said rent tribunal "made on the application of the plaintiff . . . the rent of £525 "per annum which was expressly stipulated in the said deed of "March 30, 1949, as the rent at which the plaintiff was given the "said option of taking a further lease of the said flat became "under the provisions of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) "Act, 1946, an unlawful rent for the said flat which the defen- "dants under penalties set forth in the Act were prohibited from "requiring or receiving. (6) In the premises the said option "became null and void and the said purported exercise thereof "became and is a nullity. (7) By reason of the matters aforesaid "the plaintiff is not entitled to the declaration claimed."

Gerrard J. This is a case of considerable interest and novelty. There has been no decision on the particular point which has been discussed before me. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The determination of this matter depends on the proper interpretation of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946. Section 1 of that Act provides for tribunals being brought into existence. Section 2 (1) provides: "Where a contract has, "whether before or after the passing of this Act, been entered "into whereby one person (hereinafter referred to as the "'lessor') grants to another person (hereinafter referred to as the "'lessee') the right to occupy as a residence a house or part of "a house situated in a district in which this Act is in force in "consideration of a rent which includes payment for the use of "furniture or for services, whether or not, in the case of such a "contract with regard to part of a house, the lessee is entitled, "in addition to exclusive occupation thereof, to the use in "common with any other person of other rooms or accommoda- "tion in the house, it shall be lawful for either party to the "contract or for the local authority to refer the contract to the "tribunal for the district. . . ." It is common ground that the first lease was a contract within section 2 (1) of that Act.

By section 2 (2): "Where any contract to which this Act "applies is referred to a tribunal, then, unless at any time before " the tribunal have entered upon consideration of the reference " it is withdrawn by the person or authority by whom it was " made, the tribunal shall consider it and, after making such " inquiry as they think fit, and giving to each party "—and then there are certain immaterial provisions—" an opportunity of being " heard, or, in his option, of submitting representations in " writing, shall approve the rent payable under the contract " —those are material words—" or reduce it to such sum as they " may, in all the circumstances, think reasonable, or may, if they " think fit in all the circumstances, dismiss the reference, and " shall notify the parties and the local authority of their decision " in each case." By subsection (5) it is provided: " An approval, " reduction or increase under this section may be limited to rent " payable in respect of a particular period."

By section 3 (1): " The local authority shall prepare and keep " up to date a register for the purposes of this Act, and shall " make the register available for inspection," in certain circumstances. By subsection (2): " The register shall be so prepared " and kept up to date as to contain, with regard to any contract " under which a rent is payable that has been approved, reduced " or increased under the last foregoing section (being a contract " relating to premises situated in the area of the local authority), " entries of—(a) the prescribed particulars with regard to the " contract; (b) a specification of the premises to which the " contract relates; and (c) the rent as approved, reduced or " increased by the tribunal, and, in a case in which the approval, " reduction or increase is limited to rent payable in respect of a " particular period, a specification of that period." That is a provision for the setting up of a register, which requires as a prerequisite to its coming into operation in relation to any particular case the circumstance that there has been a contract under which a rent is payable that has been approved, reduced or increased.

Under section 3 (2) (c) entries will have to be made in the course of keeping the register up to date, and it will also show the results of anything which has happened under section 2 (3), which provides: " Where the rent payable for any premises "—a rather interesting alteration of wording from " rent payable " under the contract "—" has been entered in the register in " accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained,"—and those I have read—" it shall be lawful for the lessor or the lessee " or the local authority to refer the case to the tribunal for " reconsideration of the rent so entered on the ground of change " of circumstances, and the provisions of subsection (2) of this " section shall apply on any such reference in like manner as " they apply on a reference under subsection (1) of this section " subject to the modification that the tribunal shall have power " to increase the rent payable." That power seems to be an important matter which must be borne in mind in considering this case. The joint effect of the provisions to which I have just referred is that at any time it can be ascertained by inspection of the register what is the rent payable for the premises under the terms of this Act, and the register will show decreases or increases, as the case may be, according to the history of the particular premises.

Section 4 (1) provides: "Where the rent payable for any "premises is entered in the register under the provisions of this "Act, it shall not be lawful to require or receive—(a) on account "of rent for those premises in respect of any period subsequent to "the date of such entry"—that is to say, in the register—"(or, "in a case in which a particular period is specified, in respect of "that period) payment of any sum in excess of the rent so "entered." That is carried a stage further by section 9, which provides that "A person who requires or receives any payment ". . . in contravention of section 4 of this Act shall be guilty of "an offence"; and penalties are provided.

Mr. Salmon, on behalf of the defendants, submits that the covenant to pay rent in the lease of December 14, 1946, is a requirement by his clients of the plaintiff to pay £525 a year, and that to grant another lease in the form of that lease would at the material time, June 24, 1953, be a requirement by the defendants from the plaintiff of payment of a sum in excess of the rent entered in the register, and therefore not lawful, and that that would subject his clients to a penalty. He says that his clients cannot be called on to grant a new lease which involves that illegality, and that therefore, because of the events to which I have referred, the option is null and void and the purported exercise of it is a nullity. He says that the existing lease, despite its requirement, in effect, that the plaintiff shall pay a higher rent than that shown on the register, is not affected by these considerations because the effect of the tribunal's decision to reduce the rent payable under the lease is as if it were a physical alteration of the figure, and that therefore the covenant with regard to the payment of £525 rent is, by the act of the tribunal, no longer a requirement to pay £525 but only to pay £425. I do not say that that is precisely how Mr. Salmon put part of his argument, but it is a reasonable paraphrase, I think, of one of his main contentions. He says that "requirement" has to be used in an ordinary business sense; a covenant like this in a lease between two parties is clearly a requirement of the lessor, and that contention is fortified by the fact that the very words of the statute itself in section 2 (2) speak of reducing the rent payable under the contract. So he says that it follows that that has become a requirement to pay the lesser, and not the higher rent. But he also says that that matter has no effect on the lease in futuro which has not yet come into being and which cannot yet come before a tribunal and suffer any alteration in the register.

Mr. Beney drew my attention to section 2 (3), that is, where there is already a rent on the register an application may be made for an increase of the rent, and the tribunal is given power to increase it. I think that it would be useful to put that subsection in this form: "Where at any given date the rent payable for the "premises is entered on the register, and it is any excess over "this, that it is not lawful to require or receive, either party may "refer the case to the tribunal for reconsideration of the rent "so entered on the ground of change of circumstances." Therefore Mr. Beney contends that, at the time when the new lease takes effect, it is possible that the rent may again be £525 on the register, or indeed, it even might be more, and, if the lessee is then required to pay £525, section 4 (1) will not be infringed. That being so, says Mr. Beney, how can the court today say that in June of this year there will be any unlawful requirement, and how can the court today say that the option is null and void or that the purported exercise of it is null and void? I think that that contention is right. I do not think that I am entitled to speculate about what the tribunal may do if an application is made to them. It is conceivable, if I do not grant the defendants the relief they ask today—and I hope that so far as they are concerned the future lease is a dead letter—that they may go to the tribunal at the end of the present lease and ask the tribunal to put the rent up, say, to £600, and they might possibly get the rent put back to £525. I do not think that I can find affirmatively today that, if the second lease is granted in the terms provided for by the option, any illegality will be involved; and I do not think that I am entitled to make an assumption of illegality.

Having said that, I think that it is really sufficient to dispose of the case. I realize full well, however, that that may not be very helpful to the parties, so I think that I should go further and deal with another aspect of the matter. All that I have said up to now assumes that a lease in the form provided for by the option involves a requirement by the defendants of a rent within the meaning of the word "require" or "requires" in section 4 and section 9 of the Act. I am by no means satisfied that it does. It may be that at any time during the history of the future lease the rent covenanted to be paid may be in excess of the rent payable for the premises entered in the register. It may be that from time to time the two figures will coincide. It may be, as I have said, that on June 24, 1953, the figures may coincide or the register figure may be greater or less than the covenanted figure. All that depends on unforeseeable circumstances. Can it be said that the intention of the Act is to prevent any such future lease being executed and to prohibit or render ineffective any undertaking under deed or consideration to execute such a lease in futuro? I think that it would be extraordinary if that were the intention of the Act. In my opinion, the whole matter turns on the meaning to be given to the word "require" in its context in the Act, bearing in mind the general intention of the legislature to be derived from a consideration of it. It is unlawful to require or receive—one need not bother about "receive" for this purpose—any sum in excess of the amount entered in the register. I think that a mere covenant to pay a rent in excess, even at the instance of the lessor, is not a requirement in the sense in which the word "require" is used in this Act. Any attempt to enforce that covenant or demand its fulfilment would, I think, be to require an excess of rent where the amount covenanted for exceeds the amount in the register; but I think that short of that there is no requiring within the statute in this case. Further, I do not think that such a covenant would render the whole lease void or of no effect.

Gerrard J.

I have been referred to a number of authorities, but I do not think that they really help. This is an Act of a special and peculiar kind, and the meaning of the words in the Act has to be derived from a consideration of the whole of the Act; and that I have endeavoured to do. The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to the declaration in the form in which it is sought, and to the costs of the action.

A souvenir medallion, sold in connexion with the coronation, bearing on the obverse side a representation of the head of her Majesty the Queen and on the reverse side an inscription, together with a band of oak leaves, and the royal cipher, is a "medal" within the provisions of Rule 26 of the Designs Rules, 1949, and accordingly is the proper subject matter of copyright.

MOTION.

The plaintiffs, Reliance (Nameplates) Ld. and George Henry Paulin, applied to the court by interlocutory motion in a copyright action for an injunction restraining the defendants, Art Jewels Ld., from "reproducing, selling, by way of trade exposing "or offering for sale or distributing medals, being copies or "colourable imitations of a coronation souvenir medallion, "bearing on its face a portrait of Her Majesty, the Queen and "on its back the words 'the Coronation of Her Majesty Queen

" ' Elizabeth II,' a design of oak leaves and a cypher, published " by Reliance (Nameplates) Ld., or of any substantial part of the " design thereof or by authorizing any such acts as aforesaid."

The chairman and managing director of the plaintiff company, in his affidavit, stated that the picture on the face of the medallions was used by the plaintiff company under licence from the second plaintiff, George Henry Paulin, the owner of the copyright, and that the design of oak leaves, the cypher " E.R.," and the selection and arrangement of the words on the reverse side of the medallion were designed and prepared by employees of the plaintiff company in the course of their employment and were the plaintiff company's copyright.

He stated that the defendant company were supplying to street vendors and others similar medallions of inferior workmanship and quality which had been reproduced from the plaintiffs' medallion. The defendants filed no evidence.

The question arose whether the plaintiffs' medallions were " medals " within the provisions of rule 26 of the Designs Rules, 1949,[1] and consequently could be the subject of copyright.

VAISEY J. This is a motion for an interlocutory injunction in a copyright action.

The plaintiff company has for some time past been manufacturing and distributing what I may call, by a neutral description, " coronation medallions." They are rounded pieces of metal, somewhat larger than a half-crown.

[After further describing the medallions his Lordship continued:] These medallions have apparently been on the market and sold in considerable numbers by the plaintiff company.

The defendants have been supplying a medallion which in design is, I think, admittedly indistinguishable from the plaintiffs' article; and it is alleged and not denied that that has been produced from the plaintiff companys' medallion by the use of a die, thereby securing an exact copy. Those alleged infringing medallions are being sold in large quantities at a lower price than the plaintiffs' medallions, and it is alleged that such continued sales are likely to cause loss to the plaintiff company.

[1] Copyright Act, 1911, s. 22 (1): " This Act shall not apply to designs " capable of being registered under " the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, " except designs which, though cap- " able of being so registered, are not " used or intended to be used as " models or patterns to be multiplied " by any industrial process."

The law is, I think, well settled and not in dispute. "Copyright" under the Copyright Act, 1911, means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part of the work in respect of which the copyright is claimed, and it also includes the right to authorize sales, publications and so forth. A breach of copyright or an infringement of copyright is doing something, without the consent of the owner of the copyright, the sole right to do which is conferred on such owner by the Act. There is, in section 35 of the Act, a definition which informs one that works of sculpture includes casts and models; and section 22 of the Act excludes from the operation of the Act designs capable of being registered under the Patents and Designs Act, 1907.

That Act has since been repealed, but in Usher v. Barlow,[1] Jenkins L.J. pointed out that the reference in the Copyright Act, 1911, to the Act of 1907 must now be read, regard being had to the Interpretation Act, 1889, as a reference to the existing Designs Act, namely, the Registered Designs Act, 1949.

That Act excludes from its operation designs for articles which are primarily artistic in character such as may be excluded under rules made by the Board of Trade; that is to say, if this particular artistic work (for artistic it undoubtedly is, whether the art be good or bad) has been excluded from the operation of the Registered Designs Act, 1949, it becomes subject or remains subject to the provisions of the Copyright Act, 1911.

The Board of Trade has by an order made rules known as the Designs Rules, 1949. Rule 26 provides: "There shall be "excluded from registration under the Act"—that is, the Registered Designs Act, 1949—"designs to be applied to any of "the following articles, namely: . . . (2) wall plaques and "medals. . . ."

Mr. Shelley, for the defendants, admitted, for the purposes of this motion at any rate, that the whole of his argument depended on the contention that the particular object on which this action is based was not a medal within the meaning of that excluding rule (rule 26).

What is a medal? I look at the Oxford English Dictionary and I find that it is defined as "a piece of metal, usually in the "form of a coin, struck or cast with an inscription, a head or "effigy of a person, or other device or figure to commemorate a "person, action, or event; also as a distinction awarded to a "soldier" and so forth.

Mr. Shelley suggested that this article was not a medal within the meaning of that definition, so far as that definition can be applied to rule 26 of the Designs Rules, 1949.

I really do not know why it is not. It is quite obviously a piece of metal. It is equally obviously in the form of a coin. There can be no doubt that it bears an inscription, a head or effigy, and other devices or figures to commemorate an event, namely, the year of the coronation of her present Majesty. As to whether the main purpose of the exclusion was to apply to service medals, I cannot express any opinion. It may be that that was the primary intention of the exclusion; but I think that it is exceedingly difficult to exclude these and similar objects from the definition of "a medal" in the dictionary, and from the conception of a medal in the minds of ordinary people.

During the course of the argument I suggested one or two well-known objects which would certainly be called medals, commemorating either national events or events in the lives of people or partly one and partly the other; but that this is a medal for all purposes I should have thought was perfectly plain.

This, however, is only an interlocutory application and I do not wish to come to any final conclusion as to the validity of Mr. Shelley's submissions, which he may desire to advance at the trial; but I think that, having regard to all the circumstances and to the fact that the sale of these objects is, of course, likely to be of limited duration, the balance of convenience is that I should grant the injunction asked for. [His Lordship read the form of the injunction and continued:] I shall grant that injunction until judgment in the action or until further order; and I think that the costs of this motion should be costs in the action.

Held, that the defender's averment was irrelevant and should be excluded from probation. It was not permissible to inquire what the amount was of the wife's estate and whether her own private income, which she enjoyed before her husband's death, and continued to enjoy after it, would enable her to maintain herself in future.

The wife lay under the onus of proving her dependency, which she had averred, and its extent, and the defender would be entitled to lead evidence to show that her husband's contribution was less than she represented.

Decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session (sub nom. Cruickshank v. Shiels) 1951 S.C. 741, affirmed.

Appeal from the Second Division of the Court of Session.

In this action the respondent Mrs. Catherine Cruikshank, who was the widow of the late Alexander Stewart Cruikshank, concluded for damages against the appellant, Henry John Shiels, whose negligence she averred caused the death of the deceased. A question arose as to the relevancy of an averment by the respondent that she had "a substantial private fortune available "for her support." The Second Division having held the averment irrelevant, the appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

The facts are fully set out in Lord Normand's opinion.

Morison Q.C. (of the English Bar, Q.C. of the Scottish Bar) and M'Larty (of the Scottish Bar) for the appellant.

Cameron Q.C. (Dean of the Faculty) and Grieve (of the Scottish Bar) for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

March 9. Lord Normand. My Lords, the appellant's counsel made it clear that the real issue in the appeal is whether the interlocutor of the Second Division appealed against unduly restricts the scope of the trial before a jury, which has been allowed.

The respondent, the pursuer, sued the appellant for a sum of £40,000 in name of damages suffered by her in respect of the death of her husband from injuries received in a street accident in Edinburgh on October 8, 1949. She averred that the accident was caused by the fault of the appellant who was riding a motor-bicycle which collided with her husband. There is no question that these averments are relevant. On damages, she averred that she "was dependent upon the deceased for support, and "lived with him until his death. . . . At the time of the said "accident the income of the deceased amounted to approxi-"mately £22,000 per annum, of which at least £17,000 was "represented by salaries and fees, which ceased with his death." In his answers the appellant, after a general denial, averred that the respondent "has been left with ample means for support "for the rest of her life. She is liferented in the residue of the "estate of the deceased. The deceased left movable estate of "over £60,000 and . . . substantial heritable estate. The "deceased also bequeathed to the pursuer movable property of "considerable value. The defender also believes and avers that "the pursuer has a substantial private fortune available for her "support." In reply the respondent admitted that she has a liferent in the residue of the deceased's estate, which she estimated at about £24,000 and that she has certain private means. She denied that the deceased left any heritable estate. She also added this plea in law: "The defender's averments "relating to the private means of the . . . pursuer being "irrelevant, should not be admitted to probation."

The Lord Ordinary on the motion of the respondent appointed the cause to be heard in the procedure roll for the discussion of the plea of relevancy. In the debate the respondent's counsel admitted, as the Lord Ordinary's opinion shows, that the averments that she had obtained pecuniary benefits under her husband's will were relevant. I have no doubt that this admission was correct, but this point has never been an issue between the parties. The respondent, however, maintained that the averment that she was possessed of a substantial private fortune was irrelevant. The Lord Ordinary sustained the respondent's plea to the relevancy and appointed issues to be lodged. The appellant thereupon lodged a reclaiming motion. The argument presented on his behalf to the Second Division is set out by Lord Patrick, who delivered the leading opinion. He says [1]: "The argument runs that, the true foundation of the claim for "damages for loss of support being partly the existence during "life, as between claimant and deceased, of a mutual obligation "of support in case of necessity, the award must be conditioned "by the same considerations as would affect the right to aliment "and the amount of aliment awarded in an action when such "a claim for support was attempted to be enforced. In an "action for aliment by a wife against a husband the private "means of the wife are always a relevant consideration. The "reason is obvious. Aliment is only awarded ex necessitate. "To the extent to which the wife has private means she cannot "prove her necessity."

This novel argument, which might result in leaving the widow without any claim for damages, beyond solatium, in a case where she had even a mediocre fortune of her own, though she had been maintained by her husband in affluent circumstances out of income which terminated on his death, was without difficulty rejected by Lord Patrick and the Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Mackay dissented. The court, therefore, by a majority, refused the reclaiming motion and sustained the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

In the present appeal Mr. Morison, on behalf of the appellant, did not repeat the argument which had been submitted in the Court of Session. He did not contend that the means of the widow must always be a relevant consideration or that the considerations which apply to the claim for aliment and the amount of aliment have any relevance to a claim in an actio injuriarum for loss of support. He did, indeed, submit that there might be special cases in which the widow's possession of a private fortune and its amount should not be left entirely out of account. We are not, however, concerned to consider this submission, for if a case of special circumstances was to be made it should have been specifically averred. But here there is nothing but the bare averment that the respondent had a substantial private fortune available for her support.

The point which Mr. Morison endeavoured to make was that the terms of the interlocutor combined with the terms of the plea in law, which it sustained, would prevent him from leading evidence or cross-examining to show that the respondent had not in fact been wholly supported by her deceased husband during his life. He said, and I agree with him, that in this kind of claim the defender was always entitled to ask the pursuer whether the cost of the wife's support had been met partly by the husband and partly from some other source, and how much from each.

It is clear that neither Lord Patrick nor the Lord Justice-Clerk thought that the result of their judgment would be to exclude inquiry of this sort. Lord Patrick says[2]: "The "amounts of support in fact afforded [sc. by the deceased] in "the past and likely to be afforded in the future have in my "experience been the factors taken into account in making such "awards." That is, in my opinion, an accurate statement, and obviously warrants inquiry into the actual amount of the husband's contribution. But it does not make it permissible to inquire what the amount of the wife's estate was and whether her own private income which she enjoyed before her husband's death and continued to enjoy after it would enable her to maintain herself in future, or to make out of it a larger contribution to her maintenance than she had done in the past.

The Lord Justice-Clerk says[3]: "In the present case the "pursuer avers that she was dependent upon her deceased "husband for support. She does not say that she was totally "dependent. There must therefore be inquiry as to the degree "to which she was dependent in fact prior to his death. Just "what that inquiry will involve before the jury which is to try "the case we are not asked to decide, and I do not want to say "anything which might be construed as circumscribing the "ambit of the trial." I have two observations to make in order to clear away a possible misunderstanding of what the Lord Justice-Clerk said. The first is that the inquiry into the degree to which the wife was dependent in fact would be perfectly open if the widow had averred that she had been wholly dependent on her husband and the defender had denied this averment. Secondly, the Lord Justice-Clerk certainly intended to limit the ambit of the inquiry in this case by excluding questions about the amount of the wife's fortune.

H. L. (Sc.)

Lord Normand.

Though the learned judges did not intend by their interlocutor to exclude legitimate inquiry, I have still to consider whether they may have done so inadvertently. The effect of the interlocutor is to exclude from probation the single averment "the "pursuer has a substantial private fortune available for her "support," and its effect on the conduct of the trial may be judged by supposing that the record had never included this averment. What then would be the position? The pursuer avers her dependency and the defender denies it. The former lies under the onus of proving her dependency and its extent, and the defender is entitled to cross-examine and to lead evidence to show that the husband's contribution was less than the pursuer represented. All this was conceded by counsel for the respondent.

The appellant's apprehensions that the inquiry will be unduly restricted by the interlocutor are therefore, in my opinion, groundless.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Partnership — Dissolution — Accounts—Business of photographer—No agreement as to partnership assets—What must be deemed partnership assets on dissolution—Consumable stock-in-trade.

The plaintiff and the defendant, as partners at will, conducted a business as commercial and fashion photographers. The plaintiff was a well-known photographer and brought in a considerable goodwill. The leasehold premises, furniture and studio equipment belonged to the defendant. The latter also claimed to have contributed to the goodwill of the business. Both parties brought in a quantity of negatives. It was intended that a partnership agreement should be drawn up to include the above items, but no terms were ever settled except that the parties should share the profits equally.

On taking the account on the dissolution of the partnership:—

Held, that no terms ought to be implied except such as were essential to business efficacy, and that only the consumable items of stock-in-trade, which were in fact used up, were to be included in the assets of the partnership; but, although the lease was the property of the defendant, money spent on improvements to the property for the purpose of the partnership, and money properly spent on outgoings, such as rent, rates and insurance, should be debited to the partnership.

Pawsey v. Armstrong (1881) 18 Ch.D. 698 followed.

The plaintiff and the defendant carried on business as partners for two years in the following circumstances: The defendant wished to start a business in commercial and fashion photography, and in June, 1948, he took a lease of premises in Shepherd's Market, which subsequently became the place of business of the partnership. The lease was for a period of seven years from midsummer, 1948, at a rent of £400 a year.

The defendant started to carry on a photographer's business there on his own. He was not himself skilled in photography, but he employed other persons to work for him. In January, 1950, he invited the plaintiff to come into the business as a partner. The plaintiff was a well-known photographer who had a good connexion in this particular sphere. He was at that time working as a free-lance photographer, by which he made a considerable income. He was not very anxious to join the defendant, and during the first months of 1950 he came occasionally to the defendant's studio and took photographs. From the beginning of April he attended there as a full-time occupation and brought with him his own connexion. The business proved very successful; the plaintiff's customers followed him, some at once and some at intervals.

The plaintiff and the defendant only agreed on two things: (1) that there should be an equal sharing of the profits; and (2) that the plaintiff should receive £125 monthly on account of his share of the profits.

Both parties contemplated that their association should be legally regularized, and in January, 1950, the plaintiff consulted his solicitors. They wrote to the defendant on the plaintiff's behalf stating what was the plaintiff's conception of the agreement. At that time it was contemplated that the parties would carry on the business as a limited company, but nothing further was ever agreed.

Subsequently the parties quarrelled and the partnership came to an end in May, 1952.

When the action came for trial there were two issues on the writ. First, whether there was a partnership; secondly, if there was a partnership, what the assets of the partnership were.

The defendant conceded at the outset of the hearing that a partnership existed, being a partnership at will from April 1, 1950, until May 30, 1952.

The second question as to the partnership assets remained for decision. The statement of claim as it stood did not raise that question. It was therefore decided to make an order on the footing that a partnership existed, and then to order the ordinary partnership accounts with an addition in a special inquiry so as to raise the matters which remained in controversy between the parties.

On February 19, therefore, an order was made declaring that there was a partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant from April 1, 1950, until its dissolution on either May 29, 1952, or May 30, 1952. The following inquiries were ordered: Whether any and if so which of the following items on April 1, 1950, formed part of the partnership property, or whether any and if so which of them remained the separate property of the plaintiff or the defendant. Those items were: first, the lease of the property at Shepherd's Market where the business was carried on; second, the furniture and fittings in the studio; third, the equipment of the studio; fourth, the plaintiff's and the defendant's photographic negatives and prints, which were brought in by each of them at the outset; fifth, the defendant's goodwill or reputation; and sixth, the plaintiff's goodwill or reputation. That order was followed by an order for the taking of the usual account and inquiry in a partnership, in common form. Following that was an inquiry as to credits to be given to either party.

The summons to proceed was treated as having been issued and come before the master, and as if the inquiries had been adjourned into court by him.

HARMAN J., having stated the facts, continued:—The plaintiff and the defendant, for years, carried on this business, and failed to agree about the terms at all except that they should have equal profits.

The defendant employed an accountant. Accountants are the witch doctors of the modern world, and they too are apt to deal in unrealities, and the accounts in this case produce extraordinary results. The most startling thing is that all the accounts, whether the accountants were employed by the plaintiff or the defendant, treated as something on the debit side of the business a private bank overdraft of the defendant, which neither party had ever contemplated as a liability of the business. As the so-called accounts start from that monstrous unreality, it is impossible to place any reliance on what is put on the other side. On the other side the fixed assets of the business including the lease and the stock-in-trade are set down as assets of the business, but when the chief liability of the business is not a business liability, one is not entitled to assume that that which is put down as an asset of the business is an asset.

Miles v. Clarke.

It is obvious that these parties and their advisers, so far as they thought about it at all, always contemplated that the lease, the equipment and the studio furniture and the stock-in-trade should all be brought into the common pool, and there is an indication to that effect. But the fact is that nothing was ever finally agreed about it, and the parties just drifted on and on; the plaintiff drew money out of the business in a way which finally led to a split between the parties, and in consequence they separated.

The defendant, under the advice which he was given, denied that the plaintiff had ever been his partner, but that denial was withdrawn at a very late stage. Nevertheless, the difficulty remains: upon what terms were these people partners? The only answer that can be given is that they were partners on the terms that they should share the profits between them. Now, what more?

It was rightly said that although there was no further agreement it must be assumed that stock-in-trade, such as stocks of film, was put into the pot and cannot be taken out again, and became part of the partnership assets. That is not really denied. There remain, however, more important items. The first is the lease and the second is the plant which may be worth £2,000 or less. It was argued for the plaintiff that those two classes of assets were put forward throughout as being brought in as part of the assets of the intended association, and that, the plaintiff having come into the business on that footing, it would be inequitable now to deny him a right to share in those assets. It was contended for the defendant that it was not necessary to assume any further agreement between the parties; and that any property belonging to one of them at the beginning of the partnership still belonged to that one at the end; and that the law would not make any imaginary agreement between the parties, when it was ascertained as a fact that there was no such agreement. In my judgment no more agreement between the parties should be inferred than is absolutely necessary to give business efficacy to that which has happened, and that is the only safe way to proceed.

It is absolutely necessary to assume that things quae ipso usu consumuntur, the stock-in-trade, in fact must be treated as having been brought into the partnership, and that they must be treated as having a value which must be ascertained by inquiry. They were all brought in by the defendant. I do not see the necessity of assuming that anything else went into the partnership. As the parties failed to agree it is not for me to say that the defendant must be assumed to have thrown the lease and the plant into the pot. The partnership could get on quite well if he gave his partner a licence to go on to these leasehold premises for the purposes of the business, and to use the cameras for the purpose of making the joint profits. In my judgment, therefore, nothing changed hands except those things which were actually used and used up in the course of the carrying on of the business. The stock of negatives which each of these partiers brought in was for the use of the business so long as it continued. There is no great difficulty in separating them again now, and indeed, being ex necessitate negatives or photographs taken before 1950, so far as they are fashion negatives they cannot, except historically, have any great value. However, if desired, each party can take away his negatives. The stock of negatives of photographs taken during the course of the partnership must be a partnership asset; everything that changed its existence during the currency of the partnership must be so included.

It was said that apart from those assets each party brought in a connexion, and that some value must be attributed to the plaintiff for the goodwill which he brought in to the partnership. Some such scheme was undoubtedly envisaged, but it was never agreed on, and it would be idle to suggest that when the parties have not agreed upon anything it ought to be treated as having happened. The plaintiff joined the defendant because, if he had the studio and the equipment, he could, with his connexion, make a very good profit; and presumably it would be worth his while to take only half that profit for the benefit of having the studio and the equipment. I see no reason to suppose that, though his connexion and skill were useful for making profits, one ought to treat them in some way or other as capital assets. Therefore neither the plaintiff's connexion, nor the defendant's connexion, if it was of any value (which I doubt), should be treated in any way as being a partnership asset.

The only partnership assets which necessarily remain are the studio name, or the goodwill, such is it is, which has attached to it (and I should have thought that was probably little), and the photographs in so far as they were accumulated during the two years when the partnership was subsisting.

The parties have separated; the plaintiff will take away his own connexion and his own customers and the defendant will presumably keep his own. It may be to the defendant's advantage that he will be able to keep these leasehold premises, but as they were his before, and as he did not agree to assign them or to sublet them, that is the inevitable result of the failure of the parties to make a more reasonable bargain.

I propose, therefore, to answer the inquiry by declaring that 1953

v.
Clarke.

Harman J.

the lease, furniture and fittings and the equipment of the studio did not form part of the partnership property but remained the separate property of the defendant; that the plaintiff's and defendant's photographic negatives and prints brought into the business on April 1, 1950, remain the property of the person bringing them in; further, that neither the defendant's nor the plaintiff's goodwill or reputation form part of or should be treated as assets of the partnership. I will make a general declaration that the stock-in-trade and consumable chattels ought to be treated as partnership property brought in by the defendant, and that in default of an agreement I will direct a further inquiry as to the value that ought to be attributed to those things in taking the partnership account.

Lastly it was suggested that, if the property remains that of the defendant, it is not right in taking the accounts to treat any depreciation against the property as a charge against the profits, which would mean that the plaintiff would pay half of it. In my judgment that is right. It would not be right to assume that the defendant leased or licensed either the leasehold property or the plant to the partnership at any price at all, because he did not; and therefore the result of the lack of agreement between the parties works in the plaintiff's favour, as he does not have to contribute to wear and tear on those assets. That being so, in taking the accounts no sum ought to be charged against profit by way of depreciation.

It was also said that certain partnership profits have been devoted to making improvements. For all I know that may or may not be true. The accounts are not sufficient to show. But Pawsey v. Armstrong [1] shows that provision can be made for that matter in taking a partnership account; and I propose to put in as part of the order an inquiry whether, having regard to the terms of the partnership and the purpose for which any expenditure upon the leasehold property was made, what, if any, sum should be allowed to the partnership for such outlay. If it appears that there is nothing in it the parties need not proceed with that inquiry; it may well be that they will be able to agree, because that cannot be a matter of any magnitude.

It was clear that the partnership paid rent during the partnership, and, although I shall not charge an imaginary licensee, the partnership must be taken to be a partnership on the footing that it would defray the outgoings. Something may arise on that, and in taking the partnership account the partnership should be debited with the proper outgoings during the time they occupied the premises, that is, the rent, rates and insurance.

A Greek ship was chartered under the terms of an English form of charterparty to load a cargo in Sweden for delivery in Holland. The charterparty was signed for the owners by English agents in London. The bill of lading was in English, and incorporated the terms of the charter, but was signed in Greece. The ship was lost off the coast of Holland, and in a claim for non-delivery of the goods by the Dutch consignees named in the bill of lading against the shipowners:—

Held, that, in the circumstances, it was not the intention of the parties to the bill of lading that the contract was to be governed by English law; the court, therefore, had no jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (iii),[1] to grant leave for service of the writ or notice thereof out of the jurisdiction. Further, although the charterparty was signed on behalf of the shipowners by English agents with an office in London, the contract in the bill of lading was not one made "by or through an agent . . . within the jurisdiction" so as to be within the ambit of Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (ii). KARMINSKI J., having stated the preliminary facts, continued: The claim arises out of a consignment carried by the defendants' vessel, the consignees being a Dutch company operating, as I understand, in the Kingdom of Holland. The goods were shipped by a Swedish company called Bolidens Gruvaktiebolog from a port in Sweden to Amsterdam. The shipment consisted of a quantity of flotation pyrites, amounting to about 4,000 tons. The goods were shipped in the defendants' steamship Metamorphosis, a vessel registered under the Greek flag and commanded by a Greek master. The bill of lading stated that the cargo was to be delivered at the port of Amsterdam to the plaintiffs or their assigns, they paying freight for the same as per charterparty dated November 11, 1950, "all the terms, conditions and excep- "tions of which charterparty are herewith incorporated." Then it stated: "General average payable to York/Antwerp Rules, "1924." The master of the ship signed the bill of lading, and the bill of lading stated that the master received from the shippers on account of freight the sum of 8,000 Swedish crs., insurance and interest having been paid. I have had put before me the Swedish version of the statute of 1936 which purports to apply the 1924 Convention, together with an English translation of the Swedish. I use the word "purports" in no derogatory sense, but the matter was not strictly proved, because I was provided only with an uncertified Swedish copy and an unsworn translation of the document. The Swedish statute was not proved by anybody with knowledge of Swedish law. However, I do not think that any great importance attaches to that, and, therefore, I do not propose to pursue that matter any further.

The cargo was shipped in the vessel, but she was lost near the Dutch coast in the course of her voyage, at or near the port of Ymuiden. Reference is made in terms to the charterparty in the bill of lading. The charterparty was entered into between the shipowners, Messrs. Psychoyos, of Piraeus, on the one side, and the Ministry of Economic Affairs, The Hague, on the other. The charterparty is in English, as indeed is the bill of lading. The charterparty has at the top of it: "C. (ore) 7," and it is described as "Mediterranean" somewhat misleadingly, because the voyage in question was a voyage from a Swedish port to Amsterdam. It is in the usual form and provides for "a full "and complete cargo of pyrites about 3,800 tons (five per cent. "more or less at owners' option) not exceeding what she can "reasonably stow and carry . . . and, being so loaded, shall with "all convenient speed proceed to Amsterdam," where the discharge was to take place. Freight was to be paid at the rate of 28s. British sterling per ton "payable as per clause 28" in sterling in London. Clause 28 provided: "Freight to be paid in "cash in sterling in London to West Hartlepool Steam Navigation "Company Limited, London, s.s. Metamorphosis, resident "account at the National Provincial Bank, 15 Bishopsgate, "London, E.C.2." Payment for discharge was to be at the rate of 92½ Netherlands cents. per metric ton, and the ton for the purposes of freight was to be a ton of 1,016 kilos—in other words, an English ton.

By clause 5 of the charterparty the cargo was to be shipped at the rate of 1,000 tons, and to be discharged at the same rate, "per clear working day of 24 consecutive hours (weather per-"mitting), Sundays and holidays always excepted." By clause 8 of the charterparty, demurrage (if any) was to be payable "at the rate of £80 per ton running day, or pro rata," and commission was to be payable, as I understand it, in sterling. By clause 30 despatch money was to be paid to the charterers "at "the rate of £40 per day or pro rata for part of a day for all "time saved in discharging." The charterparty was signed by one Germ for the Ministry of Transport, Directorate General of Shipping, for and on behalf of the Ministry of Economic Affairs, on behalf of the shippers, and by one Leach, a director of the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co. Ld., who were acting as brokers only by telegraphic authority of D. A. & D. D. Psychoyos, of Piraeus, on behalf of the shipowners.

It is said by the plaintiffs that they come within the terms of Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (ii) and (iii), which deal respectively with a contract "made by or through an agent trading or residing within "the jurisdiction on behalf of a principal trading or residing out of "the jurisdiction," or which "by its terms or by implication is to "be governed by English law." It is necessary to consider those two matters separately. Mr. Roche, for the defendants, said that the claim was one under a contract contained in the bill of lading. He did not deny that the consignee had a right to sue under the provisions of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, but he emphasized that the claim was one under a bill of lading, and although the bill of lading by express reference incorporated all the terms, conditions and exceptions of the charterparty, yet, he contended, the claim remained one under the bill of lading. He also contended that the order for service made by the registrar was wrong because it was made on an ex parte application and the registrar did not in fact have the benefit of knowing all the facts which are now known to me; also that he made the order on a short affidavit which alleged that the contract of carriage of the goods was made on behalf of the defendants by or through their agents, the West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co. Ld., who reside within the jurisdiction of the court. He further contended that the registrar was wrong in making the order which he made and was misled into making it.

I have to consider the nature of the contract under which the plaintiffs seek to sue. Mr. Bucknill laid great stress on the close connexion between the bill of lading and the charterparty, and he pointed out with great force that, in effect, the ship was chartered to carry this particular consignment of pyrites from Sweden to the consignee and nothing else, and that it was therefore a full and complete cargo—and he called my attention to a passage in Scrutton on Charterparties, 15th ed., p. 52, which states: "Where the charterer is himself the shipper, and receives "as such shipper a bill of lading in terms differing from the "charter, the proper construction of the two documents taken "together is that, prima facie and in the absence of any intention "to the contrary, as between the shipowner and the charterer, "the bill of lading, although inconsistent with certain parts of "the charter, is to be taken only as an acknowledgment of the "receipt of the goods." Mr. Bucknill argued that the two transactions were so completely identified that in effect the consignees, the plaintiffs, were really the charterers. I think that the difficulty in that submission is this: the charterers were in fact the Dutch Government, and under the regulations, or perhaps the law, of the Netherlands at that time, apparently, a charter could only be arranged through the Government, and the charter was made by the Netherlands Government with the shipowners. It is true that the agents for the shipowners were an English company. But, considering this matter as a question of fact, I am quite unable to say that this was a transaction in which the plaintiffs were really the charterers. I do not think that they were.

Although Mr. Bucknill called my attention to various authorities in support of his contention, I do not think that it is necessary for me to go into them in detail. He emphasized that this was a carriage of one cargo and that therefore the true contract was not contained in the bill of lading alone. Up to a point I agree with him, because the bill of lading refers in terms to the terms and conditions of the charterparty. But, as I understand it, I have to look at the bill of lading itself. The principle to be applied has been stated, and has often been referred to since, in the well known speech of Lord Atkin in Rex v. International Trustee for the Protection of Bondholders Aktiengesellschaft.[1] Lord Atkin said[2]: "Various questions have been "raised in this case; but that which comes first under considera-"tion is what is the proper law of the contract: for if that be "answered in one way no further issues remain." I will therefore proceed to discuss that matter. The legal principles which are to guide an English court on the question of the proper law of a contract are now well settled. It is the law which the parties intended to apply. Their intention will be ascertained by the intention expressed in the contract, if any, which will be conclusive. If no intention be expressed, the intention will be presumed by the court from the terms of the contract and the relevant surrounding circumstances. In coming to its conclusion the court will be guided by rules which indicate that particular facts or conditions lead to a prima facie inference, in some cases an almost conclusive inference, as to the intention of the parties to apply a particular law: e.g., the country where the contract is made; the country where the contract is to be performed; if the contract relates to immovables, the country where they are situate; the country under whose flag the ship, in which the goods are contracted to be carried, sails. But all these rules but serve to give prima facie indications of intention; they are all capable of being overcome by counter indications, however difficult it may be in some cases to find such. The principle of law so stated applies equally to contracts to which a sovereign State is a party as to other contracts.

Continuing in search of a principle, my attention was called to the decision in The Njegos.[3] In that case the plaintiffs were Danish and Norwegian merchants, indorsees of a bill of lading, who were claiming for loss of cargo which was damaged by fire when on board the Njegos. In that case it was clearly admitted that, so far as the charterparty was concerned, the proper law to be applied was English, and the question was the system of the law applicable to the bill of lading. It was held that the arbitration clause was not incorporated in the bill of lading, but that the clauses which were incorporated in it, and particularly the exceptions clause, could not be isolated from their context and incorporated without any indication of the proper law of the contract from which they were taken; that the inference was that business men must have intended that the bill of lading should be read with the English interpretation attaching to the charterparty; and that both on what should be presumed to be the intention of the parties and on the ground of business efficacy the proper law of the contract was English and not Yugo-Slavian law.

I emphasize that there was a vital difference between that case and the present case. In that case there was an arbitration clause in the charterparty which is absent from the charterparty in the present case—and in that case, at apparently a very early stage in the argument, it was frankly and freely admitted by Mr. Willink, for the defendants, that the law to be applied to the charterparty was English. The matter was determined in a considered judgment by the President, who commented, I think with approval, on the doctrine set out in Dicey's Conflict of Laws, 5th ed., p. 666, where he said[4]: "'Here, as in other "'branches of law, an inquiry into the intention of the parties "'is really an inquiry, not into the actual intention of X and A, "'for it possibly never had any real existence, but into the "'intention which would have been formed by sensible persons "'in the position of X and A if their attention had been directed "'to contingencies which escaped their notice.'" The President said that he was dealing[5] "with the difficult, but not unfamiliar, "problem of deciding what that hypothetical person, the sensible "business man, must be taken to intend when he is content to "be bound by a contract in writing of which, by commercial "usage, he is unable to see the actual terms beforehand, and "with which, in practice, as Mr. Willink insisted, he does not "really trouble himself in the least"—and he came to the conclusion that, having regard to all the circumstances, it was not the law of Yugo Slavia which applied to the contract but the English law.

I have to consider what I believe to be the realities of the situation. The pyrites were being shipped from a Swedish port to a Dutch port in a Greek ship; the consignees were Dutch and the consignors were Swedish. I think that the real point, as Mr. Roche has argued, is by what law the contract in the bill of lading is governed. There are no express terms; it is a matter of inference or implication. Looking at it as best I can, I am quite unable to find that the true implication is that anybody intended that this contract should be governed by English law.

[4] [1936] P. 90, 102. [5] Ibid. 103.

It may well be that when the contract was made none of the parties applied their minds very closely, if at all, to that particular problem. As was pointed out by the President, one has to determine the matter as if they might have done. I can see no reason why the parties should have wanted to make this particular contract one to which English law applied. If they had done so, they could very easily have put in a clause to that effect. There is some evidence that, in some cases of chartering by the Dutch Government, an arbitration clause has been insisted upon, and a clause could have been put in the contract providing for arbitration in Holland. But that was not done in this case. I do not draw any inference from the absence of such a clause in the contract.

Mr. Bucknill argued that the English language in the charterparty and bill of lading was of some significance, but I think that that is no more than one of the matters which I have to consider. I was told by both counsel, and I readily accept it, that a very large number of documents concerned with the carriage of goods by sea are in the English language, and the English language undoubtedly is used in contracts of this kind which have no relation to geographical circumstances, such as consignment to or from an English port, or without any intention, as I think, of applying English law. Therefore I am bound to hold that this case does not come within sub-paragraph (iii) of R.S.C., Ord. 11, r. 1 (e), and that it was not the intention that it should be governed by English law.

I now return to the other justification put forward, namely, that this was a contract "made by or through an agent trading "or residing within the jurisdiction on behalf of a principal trading "or residing out of the jurisdiction." I have already stated the facts, which show that, so far as the shipowners were concerned, the charterparty was signed on their behalf by an English company with an office in London. But that refers to the charterparty, and Mr. Roche has emphasized that, as in other cases (and in a number of reported cases), it may well be that the parties to the bill of lading were quite ignorant of the terms of the charterparty. I myself do not think that this contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants was one made within the ambit of Ord. 11, r. 1 (e) (ii), namely, by or through an agent within the jurisdiction.

That disposes of the matter, but I think that it is desirable that I should say something else with regard to the discretionary power of the court. Even if I had been satisfied that this matter came within Ord. 11, r. 1, it would still have remained for the court to consider the question whether or not the power conferred by that rule should be exercised. In The Hagen[6] Farwell L.J.[7] emphasized the great care which must be exercised in the application of the jurisdiction conferred by the rule, and he cited with approval the principle enunciated by Pearson J. in Société Generale de Paris v. Dreyfus Bros.,[8] where he said: "... 'it "'becomes a very serious question, and ought always to be con-"'sidered a very serious question, whether or not, even in a case "'like that, it is necessary for the jurisdiction of the court to be "'invoked, and whether this court ought to put a foreigner, who "'owes no allegiance here, to the inconvenience and annoyance "'of being brought to contest his rights in this country, and I "'for one say, most distinctly, that I think this court ought to be "'exceedingly careful before it allows a writ to be served out "'of the jurisdiction.'" Kennedy L.J. said much the same thing, in slightly different words, when he said[9]: "But, "assuming that there was jurisdiction to make an order, the "court has to decide whether, under the initial words of Ord. 11, "it was a case in which the jurisdiction, though legitimate, "ought to be, as a matter of discretion, exercised in favour of "the owners of the City of Bradford."

I have to consider whether, even if the jurisdiction was open, it ought to be exercised. In this case the plaintiffs are a Dutch company and the defendants are a Greek partnership or firm in Piraeus, and the ship was lost off the coast of Holland. I am told that the pilot survived, and I have no doubt that the master and some members of the crew also did so. I have to consider, amongst other things, where the balance of convenience lies, and whether it would be right in this case in any event to bring the defendants to this country. I am told by Mr. Bucknill (and, of course, I accept it at once, and it is borne out by an affidavit sworn on behalf of the defendants) that the persons with the major financial interest in this loss are an insurance club. That may well be so, but it does not alter the position with regard to collecting witnesses and bringing them to this country. I deal with this matter only for this reason, that had I felt that I possessed the jurisdiction to make the order in question I do not think that I would have done so in the exercise of my discretion, having regard to all the material facts which have been put before me.

But I have come to the clear conclusion that there is no jurisdiction to make the order for notice and service of the writ out of the jurisdiction, and, in my view, this motion succeeds. Therefore the order made by the registrar on August 1, 1952, giving leave to serve notice of the writ outside the jurisdiction must be set aside.

Literary Society—Dissolution—Jurisdiction of court—Motion for order dissolving society—Disposal of funds—Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 112), ss. 29, 30.

A literary institution, founded in 1847, ceased to be of use in 1894 and remained dormant since that date. The property was sold and the funds were retained by the trustees until 1953 when an application was made by them, by motion in the Chancery Division, for an order for the dissolution of the institution and the transfer of its funds to the local county council for the purpose of contributing to the cost of a museum at the local county library:—

Held, that no order for dissolution should be made, as the institution had, in the events which had happened, already in effect dissolved itself; but that an order would be made for the transfer of its funds to the local county council for the purpose of equipping and maintaining a museum in one of the rooms of the county library.

ORIGINATING MOTION.

The Harrow Literary Institution was founded in or about 1847 for the purpose of providing for the inhabitants of Harrow and its neighbourhood a reading room supplied with newspapers and magazines, and a library of works of reference. The institution owned the building in which the reading room and library were housed and it continued to be used until the beginning of 1893, when consideration was given to its dissolution, owing to financial difficulties, but no formal dissolution took place. The property was, however, sold by auction on July 18, 1894, and the institution remained dormant since that date. The funds, which included the proceeds of sale, amounted, in 1953, to approximately £2,200.

Shortly before the beginning of the 1939–1945 war the trustees approached the county council with a view to the council using the trust funds for some purpose in connexion with the county library service. No proposal could be formulated at that time, but in 1950 the trustees again approached the county council, and it was agreed that the funds could be used to furnish a museum room at a proposed central library which was to be built by the county council at Gayton Road, Harrow.

An application was made under the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854,[1] to the Willesden County Court for the

[1] Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, s. 29: "Any number "not less than three fifths of the "members of any institution may "determine that it shall be dissolved "and thereupon it shall be dissolved "forthwith, or at the time then agreed "upon, and all necessary steps shall "be taken for the disposal and settlement of the property of the institution, its claims and liabilities, "according to the rules of the said transfer of the funds to the county council for the purpose agreed on, although it was doubted whether the county court judge would hold that he had jurisdiction under sections 29 and 30 of the Act. The county court judge (Sir Henry Braund) heard the application on October 11, 1951, and, not being satisfied that he had jurisdiction to entertain it, adjourned it generally.

On July 7, 1952, the libraries sub-committee of the county council passed a resolution in that the trustees of the Harrow Literary Institution be requested to make application to the Chancery Division for an order dissolving the institution and for directions as to the disposal of the funds.

An application was therefore made by the trustees for (1) an order that the institution be dissolved; (2) that the trustees might be authorized to transfer the funds to the Middlesex County Council for the purpose of contributing to the cost of providing, equipping and maintaining a Harrow museum at the county library which it was proposed to establish.

VAISEY J. This is an originating motion of a somewhat unusual character. It relates to the affairs of an institution which has long since been, if not defunct, at any rate dormant, and which is known as the Harrow Literary Institution. It is said to have been founded in the year 1847, and there is no doubt that it comes within the provisions of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854. These organisations were in former days useful and popular, but times have somewhat changed and it appears that in 1894 the period of the useful life of this institution had come to an end. Its property has been

" institution applicable thereto, if any, " and if not, then as the governing " body shall find expedient: provided, " that in the event of any dispute " arising among the said governing " body, or the members of the institu- " tion, the adjustment of its affairs " shall be referred to the judge of the " county court of the district in which " the principal building of the institu- " tion shall be situated, and he shall " make such order or orders in the " matter as he shall deem requisite, " or, if he find it necessary, shall " direct that proceedings shall be " taken in the Court of Chancery for " the adjustment of the affairs of the " institution."

S. 30: " If upon the dissolution of " any institution there shall remain, " after the satisfaction of all its debts " and liabilities, any property what- " soever, the same shall not be paid to " or distributed among the members " of the said institution or any of " them, but shall be given to some " other institution, to be determined " by the members at the time of the " dissolution, or in default thereof by " the judge of the county court afore- " said: provided, however, that this " clause shall not apply to any institu- " tion which shall have been founded " or established by the contributions " of shareholders in the nature of a " joint stock company."

sold, no person who belonged to it is known to exist, and all that remains are three small investments and a sum of cash, which represent the proceeds of the sale of its property and certain accumulated income. I am told that it was supported in the years of its useful activities by many of the masters of Harrow School, and I observe that Dr. Butler, the famous headmaster of that school, was at one time one of the trustees of the institution.

When one seeks to discover what ought to be done with these sums of investments and cash, it is difficult to find in the Act any clear guidance on the point, because the purported dissolution, which took place many years ago, was not a dissolution within the meaning of the Act; inasmuch as the necessary majorities were not obtained at the relevant meeting. The position is that certain persons, who admit themselves to be trustees of the property of this institution, seek the directions of the court as to its disposal.

The Act of 1854 appears to place the discretion as regards dissolution and matters relating to dissolution in the judge of the county court of the district which includes the town of Harrow; but for the reason which I have indicated it does not seem that what is now sought to be done is really within the Act at all. The judge of the Willesden County Court has come to the conclusion that he ought not to attempt to exercise jurisdiction, as it is not expressly conferred on him by the terms of the Act. It is now suggested that this court, having a wider jurisdiction, can supply the deficiency and make an order for the purposes which I have mentioned.

This motion now comes before me on the application of the trustees, and they ask, first, for an order that the institution be dissolved. I do not propose to make that order as I think that the institution has dissolved itself and has vanished into thin air, but I will declare that the trustees shall be authorized, on the assumption that the institution no longer exists, to transfer the sums of stock and cash specified in the schedule to the notice of motion, those being the whole of the assets, to the county council of the administrative county of Middlesex.

The purpose for which it is proposed to place the funds in the hands of that public authority is a purpose which is clearly within the sense and meaning of the Act of Parliament.

As I have said, these institutions, though they did good service in former and perhaps simpler days, have now entirely outlived their usefulness; but one of the objects which, I think, that they were intended to secure was that an interest should be taken by the inhabitants of particular places in the history and the antiquities of their native town or district. Therefore, the proposal which has been made and with which I have the fullest sympathy is, that the purpose for which these funds should be taken over by the Middlesex County Council will be expressed in the order by these words: "That the county council "will hold these funds for the purpose of contributing to the "cost of providing, equipping and maintaining a Harrow museum "in one or more of the rooms of a county library which is at "present carried on in a temporary building, and is intended to "be established in a permanent building at Gaydon Road, "Harrow, in the said County of Middlesex."

I confess that I can imagine no better way of disposing of these unwanted sums of money, and I think that the Middlesex County Council can be safely entrusted with the duty of applying them in the best possible way to the purpose which I have indicated.

* In re MILLS AND MILLS, DECD. MIDLAND BANK EXECUTOR AND TRUST CO. LD. v. BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE UNITED BIRMINGHAM HOSPITALS AND OTHERS.

[1952 M. 1728.]

Will—Hospital—Legacy—Endowment of bed in hospital—No quantification—Nationalization of hospital—Hospital willing to accept £1,000 to name bed—Effect of legacy.

A testatrix, by her will dated May 19, 1922, bequeathed, subject to a life interest, "such a sum as shall be necessary to endow a bed "in the Children's Hospital Birmingham . . . to be known at all "times as the 'Mills' Bed in memory of my father mother and "brother."

The hospital was nationalized by the National Health Service Act, 1946.

The tenant for life died in 1950, and the court was asked to consider whether the legacy was effective.

The Board of Governors of the hospital, as it now existed, stated in evidence that they had for over 30 years accepted £1,000 for the endowment of a bed in the hospital; and that they had not considered the question since 1948, when the Act came into force, but that they were still willing to name a bed for that sum. It was conceded that the sum required to endow a bed was a purely conventional amount and had no reference to the sum required to maintain a bed.

It was contended that the testatrix had contemplated that there would be at her death a recognized scheme and a recognized sum for the endowment of a bed, the existence of which was an essential condition of the legacy:—

Held, that the existence of a recognized scheme and a recognized sum were not an essential condition of the gift; that once it was established that the gift was not to be determined by reference to the actual cost of running the hospital, but was a conventional sum acceptable to the hospital for naming a bed, there was no difficulty in ascertaining the amount; so that effect could be given to the legacy by the payment to the hospital of the sum of £1,000 on their undertaking to name a bed as provided in the will.

1953

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Ann Mills, by her will dated May 19, 1922, made the following provision: "I devise and bequeath all other my real "and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever unto and to "the use of my said sister Clara Mills during her life, and after "the decease of the said Clara Mills I bequeath such a sum as "shall be necessary to endow a bed in the Children's Hospital "Birmingham to the trustees of that institution upon trust for "such endowment the bed to be known at all times as the "'Mills' bed in memory of my father mother and brother." She gave the rest of her estate upon trust for such persons as Clara should by deed or will or codicil appoint. She died on March 5, 1929.

Clara Mills, her sister, by her will dated May 27, 1946, bequeathed by clause 8 thereof 74 legacies of varying amounts which totalled between £26,000 and £27,000. Among those legacies was a legacy: "To the Birmingham Children's Hospital "such a sum as with the amount directed to be given by the "will of my late sister Ann (otherwise Annie) Mills will make "the sum of £1,500." She died on February 10, 1950.

Having regard to the large number and amount of the legacies bequeathed by the will of Clara, there had to be some abatement in the amount of the legacies given by her will. Clara, by her will, had exercised the power of appointment given to her by the will of her sister Ann.

The plaintiffs, as executors of the wills of both Ann Mills and Clara Mills, took out this summons to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Ann Mills, and in the events which had happened, the Board of Governors of the United Birmingham Hospitals were entitled to receive any, and if so what, sum of money as a legacy. A similar question was asked on the construction of the will of Clara Mills.

When the summons was first before the court it was adjourned in order to enable the Board of Governors to file evidence as to what sum they were now prepared to accept for the endowment of a bed. They stated in their affidavit that this question had not arisen since 1948, but that for over 30 years they had accepted £1,000 to name a bed, and that they were still prepared to name a bed for that sum.

Cases referred to in argument: Attorney-General v. Belgrave Hospital[1]; Cherry v. Mott[2]; In re Ginger[3]; In re Morgan's Will Trusts.[4]

Upjohn J., having stated the facts, continued:—The Children's Hospital, Birmingham, is a well known hospital. There is no doubt whatever about its identity. Its strict title, until the National Health Service Act, 1946, which came into force in 1948, was The Children's Hospital, King Edward VII Memorial, Birmingham, but it was commonly known as The Children's Hospital. Since the National Health Service Act came into force the work of the hospital has been carried on in the same building. It is conceded by Mr. Thompson that, having regard to section 60 of the National Health Service Act, and to In re Morgan's Will Trusts,[1] a decision of the Court of Appeal, and In re Ginger,[2] no difficulty arises on the construction of Ann's will, except for this vital circumstance, that no fixed sum is mentioned in the will with which to endow a bed. Had it been a gift of a fixed sum, Mr. Thompson concedes that it would be valid and effectual; provided, of course, that the successors of the hospital (who are the Board of Governors of the United Birmingham Hospitals) were prepared to accept the gift upon the terms and conditions on which it was given.

It is further conceded that a gift of a sum to endow a bed does not, again having regard to the authorities, mean a gift of a sum sufficient to maintain and service a particular bed in a particular place in a hospital; it does not even mean a gift of a sum which is ascertained by taking the total expenses of the hospital and dividing it by the number of beds. It is a purely conventional sum, and there was no difficulty in ascertaining it before the National Health Service Act came into force, because this hospital, like many other hospitals, held itself out as ready to accept legacies for the endowment of a bed—that is, in effect, to name it—for the sum of £1,000. It is conceded that, apart from the Act, when a person gave a sum to endow a bed, it meant no more than this: that it was a sum to be given to the hospital, the capital to be treated as part of the permanent funds of the hospital, the income to be expended for the general purposes of the hospital, and it would be coupled with a condition in the will of the testator with regard to naming a bed, or, in some cases, even nominating persons or giving the right to executors to nominate the persons to occupy the bed. That was one of the circumstances in Attorney-General v. Belgrave Hospital,[3] and it is conceded that that is the meaning of the gift.

Mr. Thompson, however, submitted that the National Health Service Act makes it now impossible to give effect to the gift, there being no sum mentioned, because the testatrix contemplated a state of affairs where there would be a scheme in force at the time that the gift took effect—that is, after the death of Clara in 1950—by which it would be recognized that any charitably minded person could, for a sum advertised by the hospital, endow and name a bed. There had to be, it was argued, a recognized sum and a recognized scheme; and counsel pointed out that since 1948 the evidence showed that there had been no recognized sum and no recognized scheme. That, indeed, is clear from the affidavit of the Board of Governors of the United Birmingham Hospitals, where it was explained that the hospital had not since 1948 had to consider the question what sum they would require to carry out a condition of holding that sum as a part of the permanent investments of the hospital, that a bed in the hospital should be named. The Board of Governors said that they thought that the proper sum to ask for naming a bed in the hospital now—that is, in March, 1953—was the sum of £1,000, and that, if they received that sum, they would undertake to name in perpetuity a bed to be known as the "Mills" Bed, in memory of the father, mother and brother of Ann Mills, in The Children's Hospital at Ladywood in the City of Birmingham, or any other building to which The Children's Hospital might be removed. They were prepared, further, to undertake to invest that sum in investments for the time being authorized by law, and to apply the income for purposes of hospital services rendered by The Children's Hospital at Ladywood or in such other building to which it might be removed.

The whole question on the will of Ann Mills that I have to consider is whether the testatrix contemplated that there would be in existence at her death a recognized scheme and a recognized sum readily ascertainable by any person charitably minded, or whether that was not an essential condition of the gift. On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that it is not such an essential condition. The gift is of "such a sum as shall be "necessary to endow a bed in the hospital." Once it be admitted (as it is) that that is not a gift to be ascertained by reference to the actual cost of running the hospital, but is a conventional sum which the hospital was prepared to accept as a condition for naming a bed, then I see no difficulty in ascertaining that sum by asking the hospital authorities what sum they are now prepared to accept on the conditions which I have already mentioned. That sum in the present case is the sum of £1,000.

It was said that that is the evidence as of today, but that there is no evidence as to what the hospital authorities would have thought necessary in the year 1950. Again, I do not think that that is, in the circumstances of this case, a tenable argument. For 30 years before 1948 the old hospital had asked for £1,000 to name a bed. On the first occasion which has arisen since 1948—that is this occasion—the Board of Governors are asking for the same amount. I cannot doubt that, had they directed their minds to the question in 1950, they would have asked for £1,000

Accordingly, it seems to me that it is possible to give effect to this gift, and in the result it is a gift of £1,000 to the hospital authorities on the undertaking by them to which I have referred. That being the case, it is conceded that the point on the will of Clara does not arise. In the circumstances, as £1,000 has been directed to be given by the will of Ann, a sum of £500 remains to be given by the will of Clara. That, of course, is a gift to the hospital authorities for their general purposes and without any conditions attached, and the latter sum of £500 is, of course, subject to abatement. I will make the appropriate declarations accordingly.

Estoppel—Election to abandon claim—Proceedings for possession in county court—Lack of jurisdiction—Landlord's election to abandon claim based on trespass and rely on claim under Rent Acts—Dismissal of claim—No evidence whether defendants contractual or statutory tenants—Proceedings for possession in High Court based on trespass—Whether landlord estopped from asserting trespass.

The plaintiff, the owner of a house occupied by the defendants, brought proceedings for possession in the county court on the ground of trespass and on the alternative ground that if, contrary to his contention, the defendants were protected by the Rent Acts, the house had been sublet or assigned to them by the original tenant without his consent. The annual value of the house exceeded £100 and the defendants objected that the county court judge had no jurisdiction so far as the claim of trespass was concerned. The plaintiff thereupon elected to proceed on the alternative ground, and the county court judge said that "owing to lack of jurisdiction "I am compelled to hold that the plaintiff's claim fails as there "is no evidence that the defendants are contractual or statutory "tenants." In proceedings for possession on the ground of trespass brought by the plaintiff in the High Court in which each party contended that the county court proceedings and findings raised an estoppel against the other:—

Held, that if and so far as the county court judge found that the defendants were trespassers that could not amount to a res judicata between the parties because it was the very thing which he had no jurisdiction to find and was a claim which had been abandoned. There having been a clear election by the plaintiff in the county court to proceed on the alternative claim on the assumption and admission that the defendants were tenants, it was not open to him to call evidence in the High Court to prove that they were trespassers, and, accordingly, although on the evidence it was clear that the defendants had at no time become tenants, the plaintiff was estopped from asserting his claim.

ACTION.

The plaintiff was the owner of a house which he let in 1940 to two families named Ball and Tracey; rent books were made out, and until June, 1951, remained in their names. In 1941 the first two defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Newman, of whom the latter was related to both the Balls and the Traceys, occupied one downstairs room in the house and their daughter-in-law lived upstairs with the Traceys. When the son of Mr. and Mrs. Newman returned from war service, he and his wife, the daughter-in-law, occupied the premises upstairs. In 1942 the Balls left the premises, and in 1946 the Traceys left. On January 4, 1951, old Mrs. Tracey, who had stayed on in the house, died. After June, 1951, no further rent was paid.

On October 24, 1951, the plaintiff commenced proceedings for possession in Bow County Court against the defendants on the ground of trespass, and by his claim stated that the annual value of the property did not exceed £100. The defendants pleaded, in effect, that they had become tenants and were protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, whereupon the statement of claim was amended and a paragraph 4 added, as follows: "If, contrary to the plaintiff's contention, the defendants are "protected by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest "(Restrictions) Acts the plaintiff reasonably requires possession "of the said dwelling-house as a residence for himself." The facts not sufficiently supporting that plea, paragraph 4 of the claim was shortly afterwards amended to read: "If, contrary "to the plaintiff's contention, the defendants are protected by "the Rent Restrictions Acts the plaintiff relies on the first "schedule to the Act of 1933," alleging that "on a date "unknown to the plaintiff one of the original tenants without the

" consent of the plaintiff sublet or assigned the whole premises " to the defendants or one of them."

In fact the annual value of the house exceeded £100, and when the matter came on for hearing before Judge Andrew at Bow County Court counsel for the defendants objected that the judge had no jurisdiction to determine the claim so far as it was based in trespass. The judge's notes stated: " On Mr. Buckee's " objection that the rent exceeds £100 a year and that I have " no jurisdiction, Mr. Merriton " [counsel appearing for the plaintiff] " elects to proceed on the alternative ground set out in " paragraph 4 (as amended) of the amended particulars of " claim."

Having heard evidence and the submissions of counsel on both sides the judge dismissed the claim with costs, and in giving his reasons said: " Owing to lack of jurisdiction I am compelled " to hold that the plaintiff's claim fails—as there is no evidence " that the defendants are contractual or statutory tenants."

The plaintiff then brought this action in the High Court alleging that the defendants were trespassers, who had been since June 20, 1951, and were before that date, wrongfully in possession of the house and he claimed possession, damages for trespass and mesne profits.

The defendants contended that as the plaintiff had elected in the county court to abandon the plea of trespass and to proceed against them on the basis that they were tenants, and that claim had been dismissed, he was estopped in the action from denying that they were his tenants by a tenancy to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied. The plaintiff denied that he was estopped and contended that in view of the judge's finding that there was no evidence whether the defendants were contractual or statutory tenants the defendants were estopped from asserting that they were either contractual or statutory tenants.

H. T. Buckee for the defendants.

PARKER J. stated the facts and continued: The defendants maintained, and have sought to maintain here, that they had become tenants of the plaintiff because they had informed the rent collector that both the Balls and the Traceys were no longer there and that they (the Newmans) were in occupation, and that thereafter the collector had continued to collect rent.

The case is unusual and difficult by reason of what happened in the proceedings in the Bow County Court. [His Lordship referred to the county court proceedings and continued:] I find it very difficult to ascertain what was passing through the county court judge's mind, but clearly there was some confusion: before me both sides in effect rely on what took place in the county court as creating estoppels. Mr. Magnus, for the plaintiff, submits that in these proceedings it has already been determined between the parties that the defendants are not tenants and are therefore trespassers. He says that the defendants cannot before me adduce evidence that they are tenants because it is res judicata between the parties that, so far from being tenants, they are trespassers, and, accordingly, that there is no defence to the claim. The defendants, on the other hand, by Mr. Buckee, say: Oh, no; it is the plaintiff who is estopped, because the plaintiff by his counsel, as appears from the county court judge's note, elected, and (it is said) finally elected, to abandon his claim in trespass and to proceed on the basis that they were tenants, and that, having done so and having finally elected, then, on the principle laid down in a number of cases—in particular Scarf v. Jardine [1]—he cannot now come forward and seek to assert the remedy which he has elected to abandon.

So far as concerns the plaintiff's contention, the judgment was a judgment for the defendants which, on the issue raised in the amended paragraph 4 of the particulars of claim, might be based on a finding under the Rent Restrictions Acts that it was unreasonable to grant possession or on some other ground. If, however, one looks at the reasons (as Mr. Magnus says I am entitled to do) it does appear that the judge was holding that the claim failed because he had no jurisdiction, the defendants being trespassers. It seems to me that if and in so far as the judge did find that the defendants were trespassers, that could not amount to a res judicata between the parties because it was the very thing which he had no jurisdiction to find and which was not the basis of the claim before him; indeed, it was a claim which had been specifically abandoned.

The defendants' contention as regards estoppel—that the claim now raised was specifically abandoned before the county court judge—is a simple one. The judge recorded it as an "election"; and Mr. Buckee (who was there) assures me that he understood it, and it was understood as, a final election; and, indeed, his submissions at the end of the case bear that out. He took his stand on the basis that the plaintiff was proceeding on the alternative claim—that is, on the assumption and on the admission that the defendants were tenants. It seems to me that that must be the basis on which the matter proceeded. It is suggested that all that really took place was that counsel for the plaintiff said, in effect: "I now find that the annual value

ROSENFELD v. NEWMAN.

" is over £100; therefore I cannot proceed before the court in a " claim for trespass; but we are all here, the witnesses are here, " and, of course, if I am right under the Rent Restrictions Act " there is an end of the matter and " (in effect) " will you (the " county court judge) decide that issue without prejudice to my " being able to pursue my claim in trespass should you be against " me."

I do not think that such a course can be taken except by agreement between the parties, and there is no sign of any agreement between counsel for the parties that the county court judge should proceed on that basis. So far from that, there is clearly expressed in the notes, and it was clearly understood by Mr. Buckee, as appears from his submission, that, so far from there being an agreement between the parties as to what the county court judge should do, the plaintiff abandoned his claim in trespass and finally elected to treat the defendants as tenants. I agree that on that basis it is difficult to see what was passing through the mind of the county court judge, but it seems to me perfectly clear that there was a final election, and that being so, though it may not have been intended—I do not know—and may produce difficulties for the landlord. I do not think that it is open to the plaintiff to call evidence before me that the defendants are trespassers. I should add that if I am wrong, I should be forced to hold on the evidence that the defendants at no time have become tenants of the plaintiff; but in the view I take on the points with regard to the estoppel that issue does not arise.

In these circumstances this claim must be dismissed.

The defendants entered into a contract to sell to the plaintiffs 10,000 cases of Irish stewed steak at a price which was in excess of the maximum price permitted by emergency legislation. The contract was therefore illegal. The defendants having failed to deliver the goods, the plaintiff buyers claimed damages for breach of contract. The dispute which arose was referred to arbitration. The umpire, although the illegality was pointed out to him, awarded the plaintiffs £11,000 damages, but gave no reasons in the award for his decision. The defendants moved to set aside the award. The motion was dismissed by Lord Goddard C.J. On appeal:—

Held, that the award must be set aside because it was the duty of the umpire to decide questions submitted to him according to the legal rights of the parties, and in failing to take into account the illegality of the contract he had been guilty of misconduct in law.

APPEAL from Lord Goddard C.J.

On February 27, 1952, a contract was entered into between the defendants, Barnett Trading Co., as sellers, and the plaintiffs, David Taylor & Son Ld., as buyers, the contractual document, which was headed with the name and address of the sellers (who were described as general produce merchants, exporters and importers) being in the following terms: "Dear Sirs, we confirm "having this day sold to you . . . 10,000 cases Irish stewed steak. "Price 2s. 4d. per lb. . . . Delivery, shipment April, May, June, "July, 1952. Part shipment allowed. Payment: Nett. Cash "against delivery. . . . Remarks. Not for sale by retail." On the back of the document were the conditions of sale, which included the following: "Any dispute arising out of this contract "which cannot be settled by mutual agreement between the "parties concerned, such dispute to be referred to arbitration in "London in the usual customary manner."

The contract was admittedly one between wholesalers and not a first-hand sale. The sellers having failed to make delivery of the goods, the buyers claimed damages for breach of contract, and the dispute which then arose between the parties was referred to arbitration, one arbitrator being appointed by each side. The arbitrators, being unable to agree, referred the matter to Mr. A. C. Coltman as umpire. On August 21, 1952, Mr. Coltman made the following award: "Whereas a dispute has arisen "between Messrs. David Taylor & Son Ld. . . . and Messrs. "Barnett Trading Co. . . . and the said buyers and sellers have "agreed to submit such dispute to arbitration, and whereas the "said arbitrators . . . having failed to agree, have appointed me, "Arthur Cranfield Coltman, to act as umpire.—I hereby award "as follows: (1) That the said sellers do pay to the said buyers "the sum of £11,000. (2) I direct that the costs of the arbitra-"tion, namely £34 13s. 0d., shall be paid by the sellers."

DAVID TAYLOR & SON LD. v. BARNETT TRADING CO.

On August 26 the buyers gave notice to a master of an application for leave to enforce the umpire's award. The application was opposed by the sellers, and on September 1, 1952, the master adjourned the application to give the sellers an opportunity of moving to set aside the award. On October 29 a motion by the sellers to set aside the award, on the grounds (1) that it was bad on the face of it, in that it incorporated by reference and purported to enforce a contract that was illegal, and (2) that the umpire had misconducted himself in law in failing to take into account that the contract was illegal, inasmuch as the selling price was in excess of the maximum price prescribed by S.I. No. 1317 of 1951, was dismissed by Lord Goddard C.J.

The sellers, Barnett Trading Co., now appealed.

Gilbert Beyfus Q.C., Sebag Shaw and S. Bolton for the sellers.
R. F. Levy Q.C. and Leonard Pearl for the buyers.

SINGLETON L.J., having stated the facts, continued:—It is clear from the document itself, and from what we have been told, that this was a contract between wholesalers. The Barnett Trading Co. has a partner, Mr. Jack Toby Barnett, of 22 Harrow Lodge, St. John's Wood, who, in his affidavit, describes himself as a merchant. He, or his firm, did not deliver the goods under the contract. I suppose the reason for that was that the price had risen. A claim was made upon him by the buyers, and in the ordinary way that claim, or the dispute which arose, was referred to arbitration. Two arbitrators were appointed, one by each side; they met, and as they failed to agree they appointed an umpire, and, as sometimes happens in cases of this nature, thereafter the arbitrators became, in a sense, representatives of the respective parties, and the decision on the dispute was left to the umpire.

The umpire made an award on August 21, 1952.

[His Lordship read the award, and continued:] Mr. Coltman, who was called upon to act as umpire, is well known, and I have no doubt that he was satisfied that the sellers had failed to make delivery. The price had gone up considerably, and he awarded that the sellers should pay to the buyers the sum of £11,000.

On August 26, five days after the award, the buyers gave notice of an application for leave to enforce the award. On September 1 a master heard that application, and he adjourned it so that the sellers could have an opportunity of moving to set aside the award. Notice of motion to set aside the award was served on October 1, 1952, and was heard by the Lord Chief Justice on October 29. Lord Goddard C.J. dismissed the motion. Unfortunately no shorthand writer was present in court at the time when his judgment was delivered, so that we have not a complete note of the judgment, and though Mr. Beyfus and Mr. Levy were agreed in part as to what his Lordship had said, they were not wholly agreed as to how he dealt with the second part of the case, to which I shall refer later. It was ascertained, however, that the solicitors who represented one of the parties had some note, though not a complete one, of that which the Lord Chief Justice had said, and we have copies of that before us now.

The motion to set aside the award was, so far as is material now, put on two grounds: first, "that the award is bad on the "face of it in that it incorporates by reference, and purports to "enforce, the contract between the parties, dated February 27, "1952, which contract is illegal under the provisions of a "Statutory Instrument, No. 1317 of 1951." The Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that that submission failed; in other words, he said that he had reached the conclusion that there was no substance in the contention that the award was bad on the face of it. With that view I find myself in complete agreement.

The legal position was stated by Williams J. in Hodgkinson v. Fernie [1] in this way: "The law has for many years been "settled, and remains so at this day, that, where a cause or "matters in difference are referred to an arbitrator, whether a "lawyer or a layman, he is constituted the sole and final judge "of all questions both of law and fact. . . . The only exceptions "to that rule are cases where the award is the result of corrup-"tion or fraud, and one other, which, though it is to be regretted, "is now, I think, firmly established, namely, where the question "of law necessarily arises on the face of the award, or upon some "paper accompanying and forming part of the award. Though "the propriety of this latter may very well be doubted, I think "it may be considered as established." And in Champsey Bhara & Co. v. Jivraj Balloo Spinning and Weaving Company Ld.,[2] Lord Dunedin said: "An error in law on the face of the "award means, in their Lordships' view, that you can find in "the award or a document actually incorporated thereto, as for "instance a note appended by the arbitrator stating the reasons "for his judgment, some legal proposition which is the basis of "the award and which you can then say is erroneous." Applying those tests, I find it quite impossible to say that this short award is bad upon the face of it.

The second point which is raised is of a different character: it is that the umpire misconducted himself in law in that he failed to take into account the illegality of the contract. Thus, the sellers, the appellants in this court, contend that there was misconduct on the part of the umpire in that he failed to take into account the illegality of the contract into which the parties had entered. It sounds rather unpleasant to say of an arbitrator that he has misconducted himself, but as Denning L.J. pointed out in the course of the argument, if an arbitrator assumes an excess of authority he may be guilty of misconduct in the arbitration, and I think that I am right in saying that Mr. Levy agreed that if an arbitrator knows, or recognizes, that a contract is illegal, and thereafter proceeds to make an award upon a dispute arising under that contract, he is guilty of that which is in law misconduct.

In Smith, Coney and Barrett v. Becker, Gray & Co.[3] an effort was made to obtain an injunction to prevent the other party to a contract going to arbitration on a dispute which had arisen, and one of the grounds on which the action was brought for an injunction was that the contract between the parties was an illegal contract. The attempt to obtain an injunction failed by reason of the fact that the court did not find that the contract was illegal. The Court of Appeal, upholding the judgment of Warrington J., so decided. Warrington J., in the course of his judgment, said[3]: "I think that the plaintiffs in order to "succeed must show that the contract for arbitration with the "submission was invalid. For that purpose I think that I am "bound to look at the date at which the contract was made, and "to see whether at that date there is any reasonable ground for "saying that the contract was invalid. Was that so? For that "purpose it is necessary to turn to the contract and see what it "really is." Lord Cozens-Hardy M.R., in his judgment, said: "The plaintiffs in this action sought a declaration that the "contract which I have just read was illegal by reason of the "war. Of course, if it was illegal, then any question of arbitration under the contract would fall with it."

In an old case, Wohlenberg v. Lageman,[4] Sir Vicary Gibbs C.J. said: "If an arbitrator acts directly against law, the court "will set aside the award; but if, in a matter mixed of law and "fact, he mistakes some of the points, they will not therefore "set aside an award."

It is submitted by Mr. Beyfus, on behalf of the appellants, that the umpire, in basing his award on a contract which was an illegal contract, acted directly against the law, and in that sense was guilty of misconduct. Alternatively, it is contended that if one party to an arbitration puts before the arbitrator a contract which is an illegal contract, and asks the arbitrator to act upon that illegal contract, and the arbitrator does so and makes an award, then the award is improperly procured.

I have thought it right to refer to those authorities first, and I will now consider the facts in this case as we know them. Mr. Jack Toby Barnett swore an affidavit, in paragraph 8 of which he said: "The said agreement which, as in the next pre-"ceding paragraph mentioned, is by reference incorporated in "the umpire's said award, is illegal and void in that the price "agreed for the goods bought and sold thereunder exceeds the "maximum price permitted under the relevant provisions of

[4] (1815) 6 Taunt. 251, 255.

" Statutory Instrument No. 1317 of 1951. I was not at the date " of the said agreement, or the hereinbefore mentioned reference " to arbitration, aware of the said statutory instrument or any " provisions thereof and did not realize that the respondent firm " had entered into an illegal contract." I am not sure that it matters, but I should not think that the umpire accepted that explanation. Here is a man who says that he is the sole partner in a firm of general produce merchants, importers and exporters at St. Magnus House, Monument Street, London, and that he did not know that there was any such order.

The contract states the price of these goods, tins of Irish stewed steak, at 2s. 4d. per lb. We have before us several statutory instruments. The first which is material is No. 1509 of 1948, and that provides in paragraph 13, in regard to imported canned meat: " A person shall not sell or buy any imported " canned meat at a price exceeding the maximum price applic- " able in accordance with the provisions of the fourth schedule " to this order." The definition paragraph, paragraph 1, includes these words: " ' Buy ' includes offer or agree to buy, and ' sell ' " includes offer or agree to sell or expose for ' sale ' "; and a later paragraph provides that infringements of this order are offences against the Defence (General) Regulations of 1939. So that it is an offence if a person sells or offers to sell, or buys or agrees to buy, imported canned meat at a price exceeding the maximum price. To find the maximum price one has to look at the fourth schedule. In 1948, by this order, the maximum price as between wholesalers was 1s. 5d. per tin. That was altered by the later statutory instrument which applies to this case, No. 1317 of 1951, and by that, on a sale between wholesalers, the figure in the fourth schedule has risen to 2s. 0¾d., so that at the time this contract was entered into the maximum price was 2s. 0¾d., whereas the price under the contract was 2s. 4d. per tin.

In my judgment, that is contrary to the terms of the two orders read together, and accordingly the contract entered into between the parties was an illegal contract. I do not think that that has been seriously challenged. The price in the contract was 2s. 4d. It is true to say that delivery was to be in April, May, June and July, but I do not think that that affects the question at all, for there was clearly an offer and an agreement on the one hand to buy, and an offer and agreement on the other hand to sell, at 2s. 4d. per lb., on February 27.

The arbitrator appointed by the Barnett Trading Co. was Mr. Reginald Francis Newman, and he deposed to that which took place before the umpire on August 21, 1952. He said that the two arbitrators were engaged with the umpire for about an hour. Mr. Mischeff, the other arbitrator, put his case to the umpire, " and at the conclusion thereof I presented my case on " behalf of Barnett Trading Co. The first point I raised in my " argument to the said Coltman was that the contract was illegal " on the ground that the price for the Irish stewed steak stated

C. A.

Singleton L.J.

" in the contract exceeded the fixed price laid down by the statu" tory instrument controlling meat products. Not only did I
" describe the contract as illegal but I also submitted that the " contract was impossible to perform. The said Coltman heard
" me but did not make any comment or observation upon that " aspect of my submission."

Perhaps one may sympathize with the thoughts of the umpire, even if he said nothing, when he had before him the case of Mr. Jack Toby Barnett, who said, in effect: " I made this contract;
" the price has gone up and I have not supplied the goods, but I " am not liable if I made an illegal contract; it is a bad one for me,
" and so I am setting up that it is an illegal contract." The fact remains that the illegality of the contract was brought to the notice of the umpire. It was not challenged by the other side. All these gentlemen were engaged in the trade; they all knew that there were maximum prices, and I should think that they probably all knew what the maximum prices were. When the point was taken that this was an illegal contract it was the duty of the umpire to pay attention to that fact.

The duty of an arbitrator is to decide the questions submitted to him according to the legal rights of the parties, and not according to what he may consider fair and reasonable under the circumstances. It looks to me as though the umpire thought it fair and reasonable that the sellers should pay the loss incurred by their breach of contract; equally it looks to me as though the arbitrator cannot have had any regard for the fact that the contract was an illegal contract. I do not see that there can be any dispute as to that. Thereupon the question arises, what ought to be done? If this be misconduct in law, the proper course is to move to set aside the award. The court is given certain powers under sections 22 and 23 of the Arbitration Act, 1950. Section 22 (1) is in these terms: " In all cases of reference to arbitration
" the High Court or a judge thereof may from time to time remit
" the matters referred, or any of them, to the reconsideration of
" the arbitrator or umpire."

Mr. Beyfus submits that we can and ought to remit if we do not think it right to proceed under section 23 (2), which reads:
" Where an arbitrator or umpire has misconducted himself or the " proceedings, or an arbitration or award has been improperly " procured, the High Court may set the award aside." As I have said, within a few days of the award the buyers moved for leave to enforce it. The master ultimately adjourned that application so that the motion to set aside the award could be brought on. After the motion had failed before the Lord Chief Justice the buyers appeared by counsel before the master again and sought leave to enforce the award, as the Lord Chief Justice had refused to set it aside. Mr. Levy, in his submission to us, said that the award could be treated as a piece of waste paper, in that he would not get leave to enforce it in any event, and he might never bring an action upon the award. If that were so, he said, the award would remain merely as a piece of paper. I do not think that it is right that it should do so.

I thought at one time that the proper course for this court to adopt was to remit the case under section 22 of the Act in order to ascertain whether or not the umpire had considered the question of illegality of the contract, as Mr. Levy said that the umpire might have considered it and thought that it was not really an illegal contract. I feel, however, that whether a layman or a lawyer looks at this contract, along with the relevant statutory instrument, there is only one answer to be found—he must see that the contract is an illegal contract. If, notwithstanding that, the umpire thought it right to make an award because, in his view, the buyers ought to pay, then the court ought to set aside the award. I say that for these reasons: it seems to me that if we remitted the matter to the umpire to ascertain whether he had considered the question of illegality or not, it would not carry the matter any further. The point was raised before him; he had at least the opportunity to consider it, and he must have had it in his mind. Therefore, if we left the case standing, as Mr. Levy asked, and dismissed this motion, it would only mean that someone would have to go before the master again, and there probably would be, or might be, an action upon the award.

In the circumstances of this case, I think that it is the duty of the court to say that the award should be set aside, not upon the ground that the award is bad upon the face of it—upon that ground I find myself in full agreement with that which the Lord Chief Justice said—but upon the second ground, which was not pursued before the Lord Chief Justice as strenuously as the first, with the result that little was said about it in his Lordship's judgment, so far as we can ascertain, though he did indicate that if he had been satisfied that the agreement was illegal he would have adopted the course which I have suggested that this court ought to adopt.

In my judgment the appeal succeeds and the motion to set aside the award should be granted.

DENNING L.J. On February 27, 1952, the sellers agreed to sell to the buyers 10,000 cases of Irish stewed steak at 2s. 4d. a lb., delivery to be between April and July, 1952. At that date there was an order in force which prohibited any person from selling or buying any of such meat at a price exceeding the maximum price of 2s. 0¾d. The contract price was therefore 3¼d. in excess of the permitted price. On March 16, 1952, the price limit was altered; the maximum was raised to 2s. 4d., the very price which was in the contract. If the contract had itself been lawful, the deliveries could therefore have been lawfully made between April and July, 1952. The sellers did not make delivery and the buyers claimed damages. They went before arbitrators who referred the matter to an umpire, and the umpire awarded £11,000 damages.

1953
Denning L.J.

Mr. Beyfus has moved before us to set aside the award on the ground that the contract on which it was based was illegal, because the price exceeded the maximum ruling at that time. Mr. Levy suggested that the contract was not illegal. He said that if the parties had received advance information that the maximum restriction was to be lifted, they might lawfully contract for future deliveries at a price higher than the existing maximum. I do not think so. The regulation definitely forbids any agreement to buy or sell at a price in excess of the maximum. That must invalidate agreements for future delivery as well as present delivery. No advance information of an impending change can alter the law. It is only when the law itself is altered that the parties can safely act upon it. The contract, therefore, was plainly illegal.

Mr. Levy next suggested that if an arbitrator or an umpire had knowledge of an illegality, he could, if he pleased, turn a blind eye to it; and, despite the fact that the contract was illegal, the arbitrator or umpire could award damages for the breach of it, if he thought it was fair and reasonable so to do. It is clear that Mr. Levy carried his argument thus far, because when I put to him the case of a building contract which was illegal for want of a licence, he said that the umpire could award payment to the builder if he thought it fair that he should be paid. He sought to support his argument by reference to two cases, Delver v. Barnes[5] and Wohlenberg v. Lageman.[6] Those cases do not support his proposition, and I do not think that we should countenance it. There is not one law for arbitrators and another for the court. There is one law for all. If a contract is illegal, then arbitrators must decline to award upon it just as the court would do.

Finally, Mr. Levy contended that the procedure was at fault, that the award should not be set aside, but that the question of illegality should be decided in an action on the award. That might well be a proper course if the illegality depended on evidence, but I cannot see how any evidence could cure this illegality. In my opinion, the court has jurisdiction to set aside an award based on an illegal contract. It may be that the umpire, not being a lawyer, did not realize that the contract was illegal; it may be that the claimants themselves did not know it; and in that sense there was no misconduct or improper procurement, but, nevertheless, the award cannot stand. An arbitrator has no jurisdiction or authority to award damages on an illegal contract. It is obvious that the court would not itself enforce such an award. Equally it should not allow it to stand.

Mr. Beyfus suggested that if we were in doubt about misconduct or improper procurement under section 23, we might remit the award under section 22 for reconsideration. I agree that we might do so, but I see no point in remitting the award to the umpire when there is only one conclusion to which he could come, namely, that the contract was illegal.

In my judgment, the award should be set aside here and now, and there should be no further costs incurred.

HODSON L.J. I agree. The first point taken in the court below, and in this court, was that the award was bad on the face of it in that it incorporated by reference an illegal contract. On that point I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that there is no error in law on the face of the award which entitles the sellers to set it aside. In the first place, there is no incorporation by reference sufficient to identify the document said to be an illegal contract, and even if there had been identification of the document, incorporation is not brought about by mere reference, as is shown by Champsey Bhara & Co. v. Jivraj Balloo Spinning and Weaving Co. Ld.[7] Further, even if incorporated, as Mr. Levy pointed out, the contract is not illegal on the face of it, because the price quoted is not higher than the maximum price merely by reference to the contract itself, because the permitted prices vary according to the functions of the contracting parties, which do not appear on the face of the contract.

The second ground on which the sellers, the appellants, have sought here and below to set aside the award is that the umpire misconducted himself in failing to take into account the illegality of the contract. That is a matter which can be dealt with independently of the face of the award, if established. According to the rough note which we have of the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, he dealt with it in this way: "I may say on one "part I had some doubt, and that is if the court can clearly "see that the applicants were enforcing an illegal contract, then "it might be misconduct to proceed with the arbitration at all. "But I have no evidence." The first question, then, is whether there is evidence that the umpire proceeded with the arbitration in face of evidence that the parties were seeking to enforce an illegal contract. I think the other such evidence is contained in an affidavit of Mr. Newman, the arbitrator who presented his case before the umpire on behalf of the Barnett Trading Co., and put the matter in his affidavit in this way: "The first point I "raised in my argument to the said Coltman was that the "contract was illegal on the ground that the price for the Irish "stewed steak stated in the contract exceeded the fixed price "laid down by the statutory instrument controlling meat "products."

Having regard to the functions performed by the parties to this contract, it is clear that the contract was an illegal contract, and that it matters not that the time for delivery, when the sale was to take place, was later than the contract. By the definition contained in the regulation sale includes agreement to sell, and I think it follows therefore that not only an immediate sale at a price in excess of the permitted maximum, but also an agreement for sale at such a price at a future date must be illegal.

It is said by the respondent buyers that even if there be an illegal contract, or assuming for the purpose of their argument that there is an illegal contract, the court should do nothing to assist either party. Mr. Levy relied on the decision in In re Boks & Co. and Peters, Rushton & Co. Ld.[8] Although the matter came to the Court of Appeal, the passage relied on is contained in the statement of facts containing the decision of the Divisional Court from which the appeal was brought. The view taken by that court was that it would not be right to set aside the award; the matter being treated as if it were a matter arising out of an illegal transaction: the court would not interfere in any way either to enforce the award or to set it aside, but would let the parties remain in whatever position they were. I need make no comment on the decision of the Divisional Court beyond, I think, two. First, the present case is, in my judgment, distinguishable from that case, because although it is true that in the proceedings before this court the sellers, the appellants, are taking the initiative, yet these proceedings are, to my mind, closely bound up with the proceedings initiated by the buyers, the respondents to this appeal. They first proceeded before the master to take out a summons for leave to enforce the award summarily, to which this motion was taken out as a counter move. Therefore, to my mind, the position is not the same as it would have been if an original application had been made, not being one brought in answer to an application by the other side.

Secondly, it is, I think, clear from Smith, Coney and Barrett v. Becker, Gray & Co.[9] that the court will interfere by injunction in a proper case to prevent an arbitration being held on an illegal contract. The application failed in that case because it was held that there was not an illegal contract.

Mr. Levy argued further that illegality is not necessarily fatal even to an action on an award, and for that proposition he referred to Delver v. Barnes[10] and Wohlenberg v. Lageman.[11] To my mind, the judgments in those cases do not really support the proposition contended for. I will not refer in detail to those judgments, but it does seem to me that the headnote in the first seems to go rather further than the judgment of Sir James Mansfield warranted. I think that it is clear that, once the illegality is made plain, the award can, and should be, set aside.

Lastly, on very much the same lines, it was submitted by Mr. Levy that if the parties agreed to submit to arbitration an illegal contract, they could not complain of the illegality and consequent want of jurisdiction. I am bound to say that I cannot agree with that proposition as, at any rate, applicable to this case, because Mr. Newman, having taken the point that the contract was illegal, had addressed himself to other matters. In this connexion I would refer to what Lord Selborne L.C. said in Hamlyn v. Betteley [12]: "In arbitrations, where a protest is "made against jurisdiction, the party protesting is not bound to "retire; he may go through the whole case, subject to the protest "he has made." I think that the effect of the arbitrator who presented the case on behalf of Mr. Barnett drawing attention to the illegality was to protest against the jurisdiction, and the fact that he did not retire from the arbitration at that moment does not prevent the point being raised now.

The principle which I think is applicable is that often quoted, the language of Lord Ellenborough C.J. in Langton v. Hughes [13]: "What is done in contravention of the provisions of an Act of "Parliament, cannot be made the subject-matter of an action." In the circumstances of this case, I think that principle is applicable and ought to be acted on by this court.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Husband and Wife — Guarantee — Banking account — Guarantee by husband to bank of housekeeping account in wife's name—Payment by husband under guarantee—Right of reimbursement—Presumption of advancement.

A bank account, out of which the housekeeping expenses of a matrimonial home were paid, was kept in the name of a wife who also had a personal bank account elsewhere. The husband made the wife a substantial allowance, but beyond expecting her to keep the housekeeping account in a proper state made no appropriation of the money paid to her. The wife paid most of the sums given to her by the husband into her personal account and the housekeeping account became overdrawn. The husband gave the wife a cheque to pay off the overdraft; but this she paid into her own account, and told the husband that he would have to guarantee the housekeeping account. The husband gave a written guarantee of the housekeeping account to the bank, and the overdraft remained outstanding. Subsequently the parties were divorced and the bank demanded payment of the overdraft from the wife; the wife refused to meet the demand and the bank demanded payment from the husband, who paid £500 under the guarantee. In an action by the husband to recover the £500 from the wife, the wife denied that she was indebted to the husband and contended that the transaction was in the nature of an advancement:—

Held, that the essence of a transaction of guarantee was the implied intention that the principal debtor should retain the obligations of a principal debtor and that the surety should remain secondarily liable, and if called on to pay should be entitled to reimbursement; that as between husband and wife, the presumption of advancement ought not to be implied unless there was an intention at the time of the giving of the guarantee that there was to be no reimbursement and a special agreement that the husband was to bear the liability; that, on the facts, the husband gave the guarantee, not to relieve the wife of her obligations to the bank, but to resolve an immediate emergency, with the intention that the transaction should have the ordinary incidents of a guarantee; and that the wife, accordingly, was liable to reimburse the husband.

Action.

In September, 1946, the plaintiff, Colonel Claud Ronald Anson, provided £100 to open a bank account at Lloyds Bank, Camberley, in his wife's name. The wife had ample means of her own and already possessed an account at a bank in London. The husband also had an account at Lloyds Bank, Camberley, but it was intended that the account opened in the wife's name should be primarily a housekeeping account out of which she would pay bills relating to the housekeeping at their matrimonial home, and, in fact, the account was so used. The husband made the wife a very large allowance out of which, while making no express appropriation, he expected her to keep her Camberley account in a proper state. Between January 1 and September 5, 1947, the husband paid the wife £4,245. Out of that sum the wife paid only £250 into her Camberley account, which by August 21, 1947, was overdrawn by about £330. The husband became aware of the overdraft and a heated discussion took place at which the wife told the husband that he must arrange something and he told her, in effect, that he had already given her the money and could not pay twice over. The wife said that he must guarantee her account at Camberley, and on August 29, 1947, the husband drew a cheque for £380 in favour of the wife, his intention, as expressed to the wife, being that she should pay it into her Camberley account to pay off the overdraft and provide a small working balance. In fact, the wife paid that cheque into her London bank account. On September 5, 1947, in the course of a telephone conversation the wife told the husband that her London account needed the money and that he would have to guarantee the account at Camberley. On the same day the husband entered into a written guarantee to the extent of £500, the surplus over the overdraft being intended to provide for contingencies. The husband then stopped the cheque for £380 but from September 6 to December 31, 1947, continued to make the wife a large allowance, paying her, in all, £3,338, out of which she paid £220 into her Camberley account; and during 1948 the husband gave the wife £1,205, out of which she paid £50 into her Camberley account. At all material times the wife had a very substantial balance at her London bank and could easily have paid off the small overdraft at Camberley.

In 1949 the parties were divorced, and on November 21, 1950, the Camberley bank made a written demand for payment of the debit balance of her account, then at least £500, from the wife; the wife refused the demand and the bank demanded payment from the husband under the guarantee, and on December 14, 1951, the husband duly paid £500 to the bank.

The husband now claimed from the wife the sum of £500 as money paid under a guarantee entered into at her request. The wife denied that she was indebted to the husband and alleged that the guarantee was not entered into at her request, but was given without her knowledge or approval, and further alleged that money drawn on the Camberley account was in fact used in settling accounts at the request of the husband and for which he was liable; alternatively, that the transaction was in the nature of an advancement by the husband to her which she was not liable to repay.

John Hobson for the husband.
D. A. Fairweather for the wife.

The following cases were referred to in argument: In re a Debtor [1]; Biberfeld v. Berens [2]; In re Eykyn's Trusts [3]; In re Salisbury-Jones [4]; Bendall v. McWhirter [5]; Dunbar v. Dunbar. [6]

PEARSON J. stated the facts, held that the Camberley account was the wife's account and that she was liable for repayment of the overdraft; that the husband by giving the guarantee did not, to the wife's knowledge, intend to relieve her of her liability, and continued:—On those facts, what is the legal position? Prima facie, if this is to be treated as an ordinary case of one person guaranteeing another person's account, the ordinary rule, that the guarantor, having been called upon to pay the debt, is entitled to reimbursement, would apply. The question is whether any special defence can be established on the facts of this case, including the important fact that at the material time when the guarantee was given the parties were husband and wife. By paragraph 2 of the defence it is stated: "The said guarantee was "not entered into at the request of the defendant but was "entered into without her knowledge or approval." On the facts I do not accept that defence. I find that the guarantee was entered into at her request and with her knowledge and approval. Then, by paragraph 3: "Sums of money drawn by the defendant "on the said account were in fact expended during coverture in "settling accounts at the request of the plaintiff and for which "the plaintiff was liable." I do not find that it was used in settling accounts at the request of the plaintiff, but it was to some considerable extent used in settling accounts in respect of household bills, and to that extent that paragraph is partly true, Although that is not decisive of the issue, it is, or may be, an important factor in considering what the intentions of the parties were. It is perfectly possible for a wife and a husband to agree that household bills shall be paid from her account and that the liability shall be hers—in fact, that is probably the normal position. Then, finally, the defence states: "Alternatively, the "whole transaction was in the nature of an advancement by the "plaintiff to the defendant (his wife) and the defendant is not "liable to repay the same to the plaintiff." The theory of advancement is not very easy to apply to a case of a bank guarantee, because the presumption of advancement normally arises when the husband buys property in his wife's name, whereas in a normal case where there is no special relationship between the parties there would be a resulting trust in favour of the person who provided the money, as between husband and wife the presumption, which is called one of advancement, is the other way: that is, and I think it is the normal use of the word "advancement" in this context, the husband is presumed to have intended a particular sum to become the wife's property by way of a free gift from him. When that theory is applied to the case of a bank guarantee I think it must be understood as meaning that there was an intention that the husband should not have the right of reimbursement. For advancement to be presumed in such a transaction it would have to be interpreted as a transaction of a very special character, in that, although the husband gives a guarantee of his wife's account, there is a special arrangement, expressed or implied, between him and his wife whereby he is expected to bear the liability and is not expected, if he is called upon to pay and does pay, afterwards to claim reimbursement.

There are two possible legal bases for the right of reimbursement by a surety against the principal debtor left open by the authorities. The orthodox or more usual basis upon which it can be placed appears from In re a Debtor,[1] where the Court of Appeal had to consider what was the origin or essential nature of this right of reimbursement. In that case the position depended on whether the obligation should be treated as having arisen before or after a given date, because there was a transitional period in the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. The guarantee had been given in 1933 and the guarantor was called on to pay in 1936, and it had to be decided whether the obligation arose in 1933 or 1936, before or after the Act had come into operation. For that purpose the Court of Appeal had to consider what was the nature of the right, and the answer was in the main that in the normal case where a guarantee is given by a surety at the request of the principal debtor the right of reimbursement is of a contractual character and arises from an implied contract. Slesser L.J. referred to it as [2] "the implied undertaking of the principal debtor "to repay the money paid on her behalf." So it appears that the right can be placed on that basis of presumed contract or implied contract or, I am tempted to say, actual contract, because in the normal case what occurs, expressly or impliedly, is that A, who wishes to overdraw, or has an existing overdraft, says to B: "Will you please give a bank guarantee of my overdraft?", and B says: "Yes, I will," and proceeds to do so. That is an agreement between the two of them, the terms of which can be worked out on ordinary contractual lines, applying the principles with regard to implied terms. The intention as between the two of them normally is that the principal debtor shall remain the principal debtor; it is his debt and his obligation and he is expected to pay it. If the surety is called upon to pay and does pay, that for the time being defeats the intention of the parties that the debt shall be and remain that of the principal debtor. In order to put that position right, and to restore it to the position intended between the two of them by their original contractual intention, it is necessary that the right of reimbursement should be read into the contract or inferred to be one of the terms of the contract. The essence of the matter is that the principal debt is primarily the obligation of the principal debtor, while the liability of the surety is only a secondary liability, and it is the intention as between the two parties to the transaction as well as against the third party that that position should be preserved. That is the explanation on contractual lines of this implied term which confers the right of reimbursement.

It is of some interest to observe that in the judgment of Greene L.J. in that case there is an indication of a second possible foundation for the right of reimbursement, which throws some light on the present case. Greene L.J. said [3]: "Now where, as "in the present case, the implied request for payment is referable "to a request to give a guarantee, the contractual basis of the "action is apparent, and the difference between the old form of "action of indebitatus assumpsit and an action on a special "contract to indemnify disappears for all practical purposes. "The question whether or not the subsection applies cannot, in "my opinion, be affected by the fact that it would have been "open to the plaintiff to bring his action on an indebitatus "assumpsit instead of declaring on the implied undertaking "to indemnify." He referred to Crampton v. Walker,[4] and Hamilton v. Goold,[5] and continued[6]: "A question may arise as "to the application of the subsection in a case where a guarantee "is given without any antecedent request on the part of the "debtor. That case is merely one example of a number of cases "where the law raises an obligation to indemnify irrespective of "any actual antecedent contractual relationship between the "parties. A quite recent example of a case where the law raises "such an obligation irrespective of antecedent contract is to be "found in a case decided in this court of Brook's Wharf and Bull "Wharf Ltd. v. Goodman Brothers." [7]

Brook's Wharf and Bull Wharf Ltd v. Goodman Brothers,[7] was a case in which importers had put imported goods into a bonded warehouse and the bonded warehousemen were compelled to pay out of their own moneys the appropriate customs duties, although there had been no prior request from the importers to do so, because it was an obligation imposed on them by law. The bonded warehousemen reclaimed the sum paid by them from the importers, and it was held that their claim succeeded. Lord Wright said[8]: "Under these circumstances the plaintiffs claimed "that they are entitled to recover from the defendants the "amount which they had paid to the Customs in respect of duties "due on the defendants' goods. They make their claim as for "money paid to the defendants' use on the principle stated in "Leake on Contracts. The passage in question is quoted in "the Exchequer Chamber by Cockburn C.J. in Moule v. Garrett,[9] "and is in these terms: 'Where the plaintiff has been compelled "'by law to pay, or, being compellable by law, has paid money "'which the defendant was ultimately liable to pay, so that the "'latter obtains the benefit of the payment by the discharge "'of the liability; under such circumstances the defendant is "'held indebted to the plaintiff in the amount.' This passage "remains, with a slight verbal alteration, in the eighth edition of "Leake on Contracts at p. 46. The principle has been applied "in a great variety of circumstances. . . . These statements "of the principle do not put the obligation on any ground "of implied contract or of constructive or notional contract. The "obligation is imposed by the court simply under the circum-"stances of the case and on what the court decides is just and "reasonable, having regard to the relationship of the parties."

That is a possible alternative basis of the right of reimbursement, and I think it is of interest as tending to confirm the explanation which I have sought to give of the way the relations of the parties is worked out on the contractual basis. The essence of the matter, as I have said, is that the debt is the debt of the principal debtor and so remains, and therefore when the surety is called upon to pay the position has to be put right between the parties so that the liability becomes once more to be the liability of the principal debtor.

In In re Salisbury-Jones, Hammond v. Salisbury-Jones, the headnote [10] states: "Upon a mortgage by the wife, the husband "joined as surety, the two covenanting jointly and severally to "pay the mortgage debt. The wife received the mortgage "money from the mortgagees. Later the mortgagees during the "lifetime of the wife called upon the husband as such surety "to repay the mortgage moneys, which he did. After the death "of the wife the husband sought to prove in her estate as a "creditor for the sum so paid, when it was contended that he "had no right to prove as a creditor since the payment was an "advancement of the wife:—Held, the husband in paying the "mortgagees was discharging a legal obligation under his guaran-"tee, and, in such circumstances there could be no question of "making a gift and no presumption of an advancement. Upon "payment he became entitled to all remedies of a surety who "has paid the debt of the principal debtor, and, in the absence "of any evidence of a release by him, he was entitled to prove in "the estate as a creditor." Simonds J. said [11]: "It is clear that "he has paid those sums, and that he has paid them in conse-"quence of the demand made upon him as surety to repay the "principal sum and interest due by the principal debtor to the "mortgagees. If that were all, the claim which he makes would "be unanswerable, but it is urged on behalf of the estate of the "intestate that that claim cannot be sustained, and cannot be "sustained for two reasons. In the first place, it is said that, "the relation between the parties being that of husband and "wife, the sums paid by the husband to the mortgagee society "are to be deemed to be gifts made by the husband to the wife, "and that claim is based upon this. It is said that, where a "husband purchases property in the name of a wife, and there "is no evidence to show that it was not a gift, the presumption "that it is a gift prevails. It is urged that a similar equity is "applicable in a case of this kind, where the husband has joined "as surety to guarantee a debt due by the wife to the husband. "No authority of any kind has been adduced in support of that "view. I decline to extend the doctrine of advancement in that "way. The case has been put, really, in two ways. First of "all, it is said that at the inception of the transaction, when "the husband entered into a contract of guarantee, he did so by "way of advancement. That is to say, from the moment the "transaction began, he is to be deemed, in the absence of "evidence to the contrary, to be in some way advancing his "wife and making a gift to her. That view, I think, was not "persisted in, but at a later stage it was urged that at any rate

" at the moment of every payment so made in pursuance of " his obligation the husband is to be deemed to be advancing " his wife. That seems to me to be a quite untenable proposi- " tion. The husband made the payments, at the moment when " he made them, in pursuance of a legal obligation which he was " under to the mortgagee society. A demand being made, he " fulfilled his obligation, and, from the moment of fulfilling his " obligation, he became entitled to claim against the principal " debtor for the sums which he so paid. He had all the rights " at law and in equity of a surety who pays off the principal " debtor's debt, and, as it appears to me, the wife, or those " claiming through her, must show that in some way he released " that right." Then he went on to say that there was no evidence of the right having been released.

That, prima facie, is the position here. But as I have said, it must be borne in mind that it is possible to conceive a case as between husband and wife in which the right of reimbursement might be excluded by express or implied agreement between the parties at the moment when the guarantee is given. Suppose a case where the wife had no substantial resources of her own, but had an account at the bank in her own name, being her own account, out of which she paid the household bills and her own personal expenses, and which was fed by her husband by regular monthly payments. Suppose that in such a case in one particular month the husband was unable to provide the money, but was able to arrange by himself giving a bank guarantee to provide an overdraft for the wife on that bank account; and suppose he said to his wife expressly or by implication: " This " new guarantee arrangement that I have made will involve your " being in debt to the bank, but you need not worry about it, " because this arrangement is entirely for my convenience; it " will be my debt, and I will pay it and you will not be concerned " in it." If something of that sort had been said, I think it would be very arguable that, working out the position on a contractual basis, there should be read into the implied contract a term that there was to be no right of reimbursement. In a case like that, therefore, I think there would be a term excluding the right of reimbursement. The main question here is whether such a term can be implied. On the special facts of this case, there can be no such implication, indeed, I think the facts point the other way. The husband made it plain to his wife that he was not going to relieve her of the debt. The intention was that, it being already her debt, it should remain her debt, and he gave this instrument of guarantee to the bank, not to relieve her of the obligation, but to solve the immediate banking emergency. If he had meant to relieve her of her obligation he would have done so directly by a payment to her account. In those circumstances, the ordinary position as between surety and principal debtor prevails as in In re Salisbury-Jones,[12] and I think that the proper view of the matter is that the wife is liable to reimburse the husband for the sum which he has paid. I hold, therefore, that the sum of £500 is due from the wife to the husband.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* IN THE ESTATE OF LANGSTON, DECD.

1953
Mar. 25.

Probate — Will — Bequest to "my fiancée" — Subsequent marriage to "fiancée"—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 18—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 177.

Where the question arises whether a will has or has not been "expressed to be made in contemplation of a marriage" the test to be applied is this: Did the testator express the fact that he was contemplating marriage to a particular person?

Pilot v. Gainfort [1931] P. 103; 47 T.L.R. 376; Sallis v. Jones [1936] P. 43; 52 T.L.R. 113; In re Knight (1944) (unreported) followed and applied.

PROBATE MOTION.

The testator, Herbert Edgar Langston, was a widower whose first wife had died in July, 1935. On November 4, 1935, he executed his last known will, and on January 7, 1936, he married the sole beneficiary, the applicant on this motion. He died on December 28, 1952.

By his will he directed: "All my just debts funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid and satisfied by my executrix hereinafter named as soon as conveniently may be. After my decease I give devise and bequeath unto my fiancée Maida Edith Beck of 108 Regents Park Road, London, N.W.1 . . ." (The deceased left her everything and appointed her sole executrix of the will.)

The question accordingly arose whether this will had been revoked by the marriage.

John Mortimer moved the court for a grant of probate of the will. The only persons other than the applicant who were interested in the estate upon an intestacy were three nieces who had signed consents to the motion.

1953

In the Estate of Langston, decd.

The three cases cited in argument were those cited in the judgment.

Davies J. stated the facts and continued: The point that makes this motion necessary will be obvious to those familiar with the relevant statutes. By section 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, so far as it is relevant, it is provided that: "Every will made by "a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage." But it was provided by section 177 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (which, of course, applies in the present case as the will was made after 1925), that: "A will expressed to be made "in contemplation of a marriage shall, notwithstanding anything "in section 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, or any other statutory "provision or rule of law to the contrary, not be revoked by the "solemnization of the marriage contemplated." The material words there are, of course, "expressed to be made in contempla-"tion of a marriage."

The relevant words in this present will are these: [His Lordship read them and continued:] The question which arises is whether that will, by reason of the expression "unto my fiancée "Maida Edith Beck," is a will "expressed to be made in con-"templation of a marriage" so as to remain valid after the marriage which was solemnized between the applicant and the testator on January 7, 1936, or not. In the latter event it is, of course, subject to the general provision of section 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, and there would be an intestacy.

The only persons other than the applicant who are interested in this estate upon an intestacy are three nieces of the deceased, and they have all (and one is not surprised having regard to the circumstances) signed consents to this application.

Mr. Mortimer cited three authorities to me upon which I am satisfied that, as a matter of law, I can come to a decision which I feel gives effect to what the testator would undoubtedly have desired.

The first is a case in 1931 before Lord Merrivale P., Pilot v. Gainfort.[1] In that case the testator's wife had disappeared. Some years later the testator had set up home with another woman and had lived with her as his wife. Having so lived with her for about three years he made a will in February, 1927, of which the material portion was as follows: "I herewith bequeath and leave "to Diana Featherstone Pilot my wife all my worldly goods." On August 15, 1930, seven years having elapsed since the disappearance of the testator's wife, he married the lady with whom he had been living for some years, being I suppose advised that in any event he would have a defence to a charge of bigamy if the first wife turned up again.

The material words there were "my wife." The woman was not his wife at the date of the will. It was held by Lord

Merrivale P., who had first decided (for otherwise, of course, this point would not have arisen) that the marriage between the testator and the woman with whom he had been living at the time when he made the will was a valid marriage, and that the will would therefore otherwise be caught by the provision of the 1837 Act, that the use of the words " my wife " in those circumstances was the expression of a contemplation of marriage to that particular woman. Lord Merrivale P. summarized his conclusion at the end of a very short judgment in these words [2]: " Under the circumstances I do not think that it can be doubted " that the will was in contemplation of the subsequent marriage " and practically expresses that contemplation and is good." That decision, on the particular facts, has been criticized in Theobald on Wills, 10th ed., at p. 37.

But the President there applied the test as to whether there was a practical expression of the fact of a contemplation of marriage. It would therefore appear to be the law that the test is this: Did the testator express the fact that he was contemplating marriage to a particular person?
